An elephant in Calcutta had a disease in his eye. For three days he had been completely blind. The owner, an engineer officer, asked the doctor if he could do anything to relieve the poor animal. The doctor said he would try nitrate of silver, which was a remedy commonly applied to a similar disease in the human eye. The large animal was ordered to lie down, and at first, on the application of the remedy, raised a most extraordinary roar at the acute pain which it occasioned. The effect, however, was wonderful. The eye was in a manner restored, and the animal could partially see. The next day, when he was brought and heard the doctor's voice, he lay down of himself, placed his enormous head on one side, curled up his trunk, drew in his breath, just like a man about to endure an operation, gave a sigh of relief when it was over, and then by trunk and gesture evidently wished to express his gratitude.

Muscle Rays.

There would appear to be no longer any doubt that rays are given off by active muscle and nerves. Dr. Hugh Walsham and Mr. Leslie Miller point out that experiments are remarkably easy to perform, and are absolutely convincing as to the actual existence of the rays. The fluorescent screens are prepared with hexagonal zinc blende, which is placed in the form of a very thin film on thin paper, gold-beater's skin or thin celluloid. The screen is excited and the fluorescent light allowed to die away until it has reached the steady stage. At this point if a muscle in a state of contraction be placed underneath the fluorescent screen it will be seen to brighten perceptibly.—Philadelphia Telegraph.

Few Hopes of Marriage.

One of the ladies who wear what is called with a sad pathos "the rational costume" has confessed that the fashion has one drawback. Ladies who wear it, she says, must expect to put matrimony out of their thoughts, for men do not appear to be drawn toward this particular form of progress. This is probably true of the ordinary man, but there is always the vegetarian as a last resource.

Cruelty to Animals Unknown in China.

Many years ago we suggested at Paris to Mr. Burlingame our then Minister to China, the starting of a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals in China. His reply was: "Cruelty to animals is unknown in China."—Our Dumb Animals.

LITTLE AND SWEET.

So many things there be
Little and sweet!
Hark what I sing to thee,
See what I bring to thee—
Little wild strawberry
Dainty to eat,
Nicest of all berries,
Little and sweet!

Hush—outside, a song,
"Twee-wee-wee-weet!"
Hiding the grass among,
Shaking his silver tongue,
Flits the sparrow along.
Hear him repeat,
Oh, such a little song,
Little and sweet!

Tell me what this one is—
'Tis n't to eat!
Better than berries
Or birdies or cherries!
Dimpled and pink from his Head to his feet,
Ah, Mama's baby, ah,
Little and sweet!

—Ann Brewster, in Little Folks.

THE LITTLE WHITE LAMB.

The baby, Wee Boy Geordie, was very sick, and all the other children had been sent out of the house to stay until he was better. Only a few of his favorite toys had been taken out of the nursery, and nobody played there at all.

It was very sad; and the worst of it was that the little White Lamb, the best loved of all his playthings, could not be found, though they had hunted high and low. The baby called incessantly for him.

"Where's White Lambie? Geordie want to play wiv him," he said over and over.

In vain did they offer other toys.

"No, no! want White Lambie!" he said in his weak little voice.

The kind old doctor held the hot hands in his and shook his head.

"This won't do at all," he said, gravely. And he looked very worried.

So did mamma and papa and the nurse.

"Where, oh, where, can little White Lambie be?" they said to each other.

Now, the walls have ears, and they hear, you know. They talk sometimes too. Have you never heard them say "Cr-r-ah" at night when you are alone? So the news of it came to the Nursery People.

"Oh, if only the Captain of the Tin Soldiers were here!" they said sadly. "For who among us can go to find White Lambie?" And they looked at each other in distress. "Who can go?" they repeated.

Not Jack-in-the-Box, though he could he, when he could only move up and down in his box? Not the toy Noah from the ark, he was too small. Not the Top; he could only move when somebody set him a-spinning. Not the little Cuckoo, she could not leave the clock.

Then up spoke the little Black Dog with the curly tail:

"I—I will find White Lambie and bring him home to Wee Boy Geordie this very night."

And all the Nursery People clapped their hands in joy; for who could go better than the little Black Dog? So, when the stars twinked in the west and the slim new Moon leaned low in her silvery chariot, he pushed open the door and trotted out into the hall.

White Lambie was not on the window sill, nor yet in the dark corners of the hall. So he pattered down the stairway where, months before, the captain marched his soldiers. At the foot was the heavy door, locked and barred for the night.

"Bow-wow!" said the Little Dog, pushing against it with all his might. "Let me out, you surly old door! How dare you stop me!"

Then slowly, very slowly, it turned on its hinges and let him out. Once outside he paused, as if he hardly knew where to look first. He laid his nose to the ground and smelled just as a real dog would do. Had White Lambie strayed down the street? Barking fiercely, he went to see; but no little woolly lamb did he spy.

He turned and circled the house, peering into all the places where the children might have dropped him, still no lambie. Then he went out to the stable where the patient horses stood in their stalls.

"Have you seen White Lambie?" he asked, standing on his hind legs in his excitement.

"Not we," they answered with a friendly neigh. And the little Black Dog turned sadly away.

Then, as he scampered over the grass, he saw the print of a tiny hoof.

"Oho!" laughed he; "now I know where White Lambie is."

And he ran as fast as his feet could carry him to the garden. There, fast asleep in a bed of snowdrops, lay White Lambie.

"Wake up! wake up!" said the Little Dog. "The baby is sick, and he's calling for you."

"What baby?" said the Lamb, rubbing his eyes.

"Why, our baby, of course—Wee Boy Geordie! Run, White Lamble, run, or I will bite your heels," scolded the Little Dog.

Soon the Nursery People heard the pattering of their feet upon the stairs, and they said to one another:—

"The little Black Dog has found the Lambie, and is driving him to the door of the baby's room."

And, sure enough, when nurse opened the door there was the little lost lamb; but the black doggie had scampered away to the nursery. "Well, of all things in this world," said she, "if here isn't the lamb that blessed child's crying for. But how did it ever get here?"

Then she picked him up and laid him on the coverlet where the thin white hands could reach him. The baby seized him eagerly, and with a long sigh of content he laid his cheek upon the lamb's back, and snuggled down to sleep. When the doctor came in the morning Wee Boy Geordie was out of danger. But only the Nursery People know how the little Black Dog found the lamb asleep and drove him home, and not one of them will ever tell.—Pearl Howard Campbell, in Sunday.

FRIENDLY PETS.

"Uncle Harry," just back from California, was talking to the family one evening about deer and dogs often being such great friends.

"In the town of Oroville, Cal., where I live," he said, "I very recently saw a fawn, still in its spots, rambling about the main street; dogs that were in nowise accustomed to it went up and passed on. The fawn was perfectly unconcerned.

"Two years ago there was another deer, over half grown, in the same town, which had as its companion and safeguard a large Newfoundland. These animals were often seen playing together and went downtown together at their own desire. On these trips the Newfoundland seemed, by instinct, to know that the deer was at the mercy of other dogs, and saw to it that no dog molested the deer. The family owning these two attractive animals has moved from Oroville, taking their interesting friends.

"Another nearly grown doe I saw last year (adjoining the same town) standing in a little creek with some cattle. I was told that it came and went to pasturage and to milking (of course the deer was not milked) daily with the cows. In 1897 I was at Eden Valley ranch for a month. A wild, rough country in Mendocino county, California, surrounds this ranch. Big and small game is abundant there. The wild cattle in the 'roughs' are the most interesting features there.

"The cattle dogs, wild hog dogs, bear dogs and deer dogs are taught to attack and pursue tirelessly. The most exciting chase and fight I ever witnessed was between these dogs and a great wild bear that succeeded in ripping two out of six of the largest and best trained dogs. The bear was finally secured alive and dragged into the corral at the tail of a riata, snubbed to the horn of the saddle of the chief vaquero.

"For a month I saw a male and female fawn move with perfect unconcern among these dogs, and all lap milk from the same trough (the fawn does not lap, but drinks like a pig and drinks milk like a starved pig). It was laughable to see them pushing each other while gulping milk. These dogs that ran off the mother doe were the first to discover her young, but did not seize them as they would have done the doe. When strange dogs passing this ranch house on the road espied the fawns in the orchard or the meadow, they naturally 'went for' the fawns. I expressed apprehension, but I was told by the wife of the proprietor that the home dogs kept a sharp outlook for strange dogs and always protected the fawns. I saw evidences there of this.

"I know a gentleman in Virginia whose shepherd dog chased a tame deer all about the grounds at top speed to the infinite delight of both animals. After the race deer and dog would come up to their master."

CRUSOE'S ISLAND.

In writing "Robinson Crusoe," Defoe, with a story teller's license, took many liberties with the original narrative. One of these changes has been to tell us that Crusoe's island was situated on the east coast of South America; near the mouth of the Orinoco River. There can be no doubt, however, that the island of Juan Fernandez, with its cave and its lookout, was the island which Defoe has described; nor that the adventures of Alexander Selkirk have been faithfully reproduced, with an added charm, in the story of "Robinson Crusoe."—St. Nicholas.

A JAPANESE PANDORA

O Hana San's Husband Was a Russian With Secrets Which Were Discovered.

The Japanese have never been Russians personally. Russian residents of Japan were often thought of. The Russian ambassador, Baron Rosen, enjoyed the of all classes, and at the Interclub was a favorite of many friends.

The sudden rupture of peaceful relations between the two brought grief to many a friends, and even caused the tion of man and wife, says the Transcript. There comes case of one Russian married to anese, and living at Yo spoke Japanese almost and was in almost every affectionate husband. may be called O Hana San, fond of her husband, and until late in January, when most sanguine had abandoned peace.

For some time before this O Hana San had noticed that her band, though frank and open things, attached great importance a sort of despatch box, which he allowed to leave his side for stant. Even under normal circumstances this fact would have her curiosity, both as a woman Japanese at that, but as a reader the vernacular press she was aware that were such beings as sian spies in existence, and though her husband was ostensibly teacher, she really knew nothing his antecedents.

The husband had been only a patriot. But patriotism is admirable the grand passion of the Japanese. In feudal days it took the form of ality to a lord, and no true Samurai would hesitate for a moment between the claims of a blood relative and those of his chiefs. Today the emperor is the great over-lord, and O Hana San, though she loved her husband, could not doubt for where her duty lay. A Japanese proverb has it, "Chushin ji kun ni kaezu." "A faithful servant will not serve two masters," and acting on this belief O Hana San determined to get possession of the despatch box and see what it contained. So one morning she took advantage of a time when Russian weakness and made her husband frightfully drunk, and seizing the box hurried to the nearest police station. Here she told her story, and the inspector commended her for her patriotic action.

The box was broken open and found enough contained numerous maps and plans of Japanese fortifications, naval ports, besides several valuable Russian documents bearing upon the enemy's military and naval schemes. O Hana San was praised more than ever. She smiled. The police officials were jubilant. Glory would be reflected on them when, with great importance they should hand this box to the high authorities. They passed one another's backs. O Hana San had no difficulty in walking away unnoticed in their preoccupation. The husband waked from his stupor in time. Finding despatch box and wife both gone, he drew his conclusions and promptly left the country. As for O Hana San, she was never seen again. She had turned a corner and was gone.

Tame Humming Birds.

Of all the birds, the humming birds, especially when young, seem to display the least fear, says a writer in Country Life in America. It is a difficult matter to train a young robin bird to follow one about the garden or to come when called, yet we have had several humming birds that were perfectly domesticated, and more thoroughly tame than any bird I have ever seen. Two humming birds that grew up with us were given a small place in a cage in our sleeping apartment. At the approach of daylight they would dart out into the room, the door being open, and directly to the bed, hovering over my face, their loud humming wings awakening me at once. There was no mistaking that the birds wished their breakfast, and they could not be driven away. At times I would purposely not to see them and they would gracefully alight on the bed, uttering a quaint little sound, now petulant in protest, then would hover over my face, so near that the wind from the rapidly moving wings, was quite sufficient to arouse me. When I held out my finger one or both would instantly on it and gaze at me in a manner which spoke volumes to any one imaginative enough to think they understood the language of birds when they are hungry.

Their food consisted of sugar and water, which was fed to them from a chop-stick-like straw tube, and upon seeing it they would hover in the air and lick the drops on the end until they were satisfied. Occasionally they would poise themselves before big red flowers printed on the curtains. They recognized the pictures of flowers on sight and would endeavor to press their bills into the artificial flowers were applied in the same way. In a word, these birds, helpless, the smallest of which when hatched required no education, no training from parents; it was all instinctive.

Ruins of the Ancient Inca Empire

By Walter L. Beasley

IT is said that the Incas [who] did not commence to be conquerors until they had first shown themselves to be statesmen and wise and [ju]dicious administrators. Having obtained a fairly advanced civilization they began gradually to overawe and incorporate the territory of less cultured tribes of the coast and slopes of the Andes, who slowly absorbed both the religion and superior handicraft of their conquerors. These conquests extended over a period of several centuries. The permanent establishment of Inca power is attributed to their having secured the good graces of their new subjects, and to their liberal treatment and policy of conciliation, than to force of arms. This continued until the limits of Inca rule extended from the central plateau of Bolivia to the western coast of Peru, north to Ecuador, and south to northern Chile. The inhabitants of this territory embrace many different tribes with local rulers, living in different stages of enlightenment.

Under Inca sway and influence, both architecture and the various industrial arts reached their highest degree of efficiency. Few, if any, countries of modern times have equaled the extreme and skillful utilization of land that was practiced during the time the Inca Empire flourished. In many localities they built their dwellings among rough rocks, on arid slopes of hills, in order to use the limited area of soil for agriculture. They terraced up every hill and mountainside until not a single spare foot of surface was left unimproved. They likewise constructed aqueducts for irrigation purposes, and also a series of magnificent roads, from twenty-five to fifty feet in width, paved with blocks of stone, which connected their royal capital at Cuzco with the various provinces. One of the most noteworthy of the coast ruins investigated by Mr. Bandelier, who was sent out under the auspices of the American Museum of Natural History, were those of Chan-Chan, commonly called Chimu, near the present city of Truxillo, typical views of which are here reproduced. The ruins extend for a distance of three miles, and are one and a half miles in width. Nothing remains of the original appearance and former grandeur of the buildings, except well-laid foundations, massive and peculiarly ornamented walls and groups of single-story, gable-roofed houses and courtyards. Mr. Bandelier estimates that some 40,000 persons occupied the place. The architectural plan of Chan-Chan comprised a series of about twenty open squares of courtyards intersecting one another. On certain sides facing these were erected a number of palaces or religious edifices. Each square was surrounded by an exterior wall of adobe blocks twenty-five feet in height. The larger buildings contained innumerable chambers and corridors, traversed by narrow passageways. Many treasures of gold and silver are said to have been found in these chambers and apartments. Around one of the great public squares were arranged some of the one-story adobe dwellings of the inhabitants. These are to-day graphically outlined, and preserve their original appearance, showing sharply-pitched gable roofs. There are no traces of windows. Light and ventilation seem to have been furnished by the door alone. It is supposed that some of the great squares and inclosures were occupied by the various craftsmen and industrial workers in pottery, weavers and dyers of fabrics, and fashioners of metal ornaments for the use of the ruler, his household and his priests. One of the curiosities discovered by Mr. Bandelier was an altar some fifty feet below the surface, which formed the heart of a great artificial mound, and which evidently occupied the central place in a large building devoted to religious worship.

Burial Tower, Sillustani, Peru.

One of the noteworthy phases of the Chan-Chan ruins were the ornamented walls of two of its buildings, thought to have been devoted to sacred purposes, or to have served as the abode of the ruler. In one instance a series of designs had been sunk a half foot or more in the adobe over the entire wall, now seven feet high. Possibly these may have been apertures for hiding gold and other ceremonial offerings, and afterward sealed up by an additional adobe coating. Another facade, ten or more feet in height, is tastefully decorated with a network of frescoes in a series of duplicated designs of a conventionalized bird. These walls are surrounded by a mass of fallen debris, and nothing is left to throw any light upon their ancient splendor. Probably the most monumental and puzzling of all of the Inca ruins is the great pyramid on the banks of the Moche River. Sphinx-like, this majestic artificial mound rises upward in the air 150 feet, crowned by a series of terraces. It is 800 feet in length. The massive and imposing mound, reared by ancient builders, has marvelously defied time and vandalism, and still holds fast the secret of its creation, for it remains to-day a veritable enchanting riddle to the archeologist. The best preserved architectural ruins, and those showing to striking advantage the extraordinary skill of the Incas in handling, polishing, and setting massive stone blocks, are the Chullpas or burial towers. A celebrated and typical group is found at Sillistani, near Puna, built on a promontory 200 feet high. These peculiar and sumptuous sepulchres are termed by the late E. G. Squier, an authority on Peruvian culture, "the most elaborate and architecturally the most wonderful works of aboriginal Americans." The one here pictured is twenty-five feet high, twenty-seven feet in circumference on the top, and twenty-two at the base. The majority are round; others are square in shape. In these the bodies were interred with great pomp and ceremony, together with rich offerings of gold, silver and choice pottery. The interiors of the Chulpas vary in size and construction; some have a single vaulted chamber, others two, arched over by stone. A few have niches. The entrance is gained through a small opening at the bottom, hardly large enough to admit the body of a man. This was closed by a stone slab.—Scientific American.

DUMBBELL OR INDIAN CLUB.

An Excellent Feature in an Exercising Apparatus.

An entirely new design of dumbbell has recently been patented which permits of its use in much the same movements in which Indian clubs are employed. The original feature of the device is in the addition of a supplementary adjustable handle. The weights are of the usual spherical form, and are joined by the usual shaped handle. Projecting radially from the ends of this handle are two parallel arms. Between those arms is disposed a second handle, pivoted in such a manner as to extend the reach or grasp of the fingers and thumb. The practical effect of this construction is to give a firmer and more vigorous grasp, resulting in a better development of the muscles of the hand and forearm. A minor detail in the design is the provision for the adjustment of this auxiliary handle so as to make the span of the grasp longer or shorter as desired.

The dainty waist shown is made of sheer white Persian lawn, with the yoke and frills of Valenciennes lace, applique of embroidery and belt of messaline satin, but the list of equally satisfactory materials is almost limitless. The model is an admirable one and can be made, as is this one, unlined, or over the fitted foundation, when it becomes suited to the many soft silks and wools of the season. The deep, scalloped yoke is eminently becoming, and the fall of lace below makes a most graceful finish at the same time that it adds to the breadth of the shoulders.

The waist consists of the lining, which is smoothly fitted, front, backs and yoke. Both front and backs are gathered at upper and lower edges and droop over the full belt. The yoke is separate and arranged over the whole and the sleeves are soft and full, with groups of tucks above the wrists which provide additional fulness for the drooping puffs.

The quantity of material required for the medium size is four yards twenty-one inches wide, three yards twenty-seven inches wide, or one and seven-eighth yards forty-four inches wide, with five-eighth yards of all-over lace, five and one-half yards of lace, two and one-half yards of applique and one-half yard of silk for belt to make as illustrated.

Colors For Hats.

Shades of blue, shades of Bordeaux, shades of green, shades of pink, are all favorite ideas for the entirely straw toque. It seems agreed that costume and hat shall make a compact as to color, and on these lines one notices that the new sleeve frills are of chiffon, matching the fabric of the frock or the coat and skirt in question. And this will be a very pretty fashion, of which a charming variation may be found in having the chiffon flowered, although the groundwork matches the material of the frock. For instance, with a black frock, frills or rose-patterned black chiffon, with a dark blue, frills of white and pinky-flowered blue chiffon, and then lace and chiffon may be blended.

The Coin Spot of Green.

The coin spot of green is now in evidence on crash or organdy, and on the useful foulard and also on the newer mohairs. It looks best on a white or a black ground. Fortunately the coin spots are set at proper intervals, not too close together. An ecru grass cloth patterned with coin spots of cool willow green, set at intervals never closer than five inches apart, is one of the successes of the season. A gown of this sort requires but little trimming, usually bands of the plain material, not using the spotted parts, finished with double row of shoemaker's stitching.

Put on Smart Jackets.

A good deal of braiding in gold and silver is being put on smart jackets, vests and gowns. It is said that all sorts of silver chains, belts, buckles and ornaments are to be worn with the white summer gowns.

Shirrings.

Shirrings are still so much in vogue in Paris, both for skirt and bodice embellishment, that they bid fair to stay in fashion here for some time to come.

Fancy Blouse Waist.

Fancy waists made with deep berthas and shallow yokes are conspicuous favorites of the season and are most charming made of the dainty thin materials so much in vogue. This one combines silk mull, all-over lace and inserted tucking, with trimming of narrow Valenciennes frills and is unlined, but the design suits soft silks and wools equally well and can be made over the fitted foundation whenever preferred. The horizontal tucks in waist and sleeves are among the notable features of the latest designs, and in addition to being effective, serve the practical end of giving needed body to thin fabrics. The belt is one of the new draped ones, and the waist blouses over it most becomingly.

The waist consists of the lining, the full front and backs and the deep scalloped bertha. The shallow yoke is formed by facing the lining to required depth and can be made transparent by cutting the foundation away beneath, whenever such effect is desired. The sleeves are simply full, shirred to form frills at their lower edges.

The quantity of material required for the medium size is six and three-fourth yards twenty-one inches wide, five and one-half yards twenty-seven inches wide, or three yards forty-four inches wide, with five-eighth yards of all-over lace for bertha, one-half yard of inserted tucking for yoke and twenty-one yards of narrow lace to make as illustrated.

A FABLE.

BY M'LANDBURGH WILSON.

There was a very learned man
Who had a foolish wish;
He set a mouse-trap on a bank
In hopes of catching fish.

He then went home and all day long
He sat around the house;
With rod and reel and wriggling worm,
He tried to catch a mouse.

The moral of his enterprise
The whole of life will match;
You always should adapt your bait
To what you want to catch.

Editor Union:

Here I come for the first time to say a few words in regard to our tax collector. We have had T. J. Hubbard for the last eight years. We know him and know that he has done his duty; that he was a populist at the first and will be to the end; he is a good man; why not elect him again? Some say he has had the office long enough, but when we get something that is good, why not keep it? And T. J. Hubbard is a good man and has stood to his party. I can't tell how much I think of a man who is true to his word, and he is true; we have tried him, so let's nominate him again and elect him in November with the balance of our ticket. Good wishes to THE UNION.

I AIN'T A DEMOCRAT.

PLEASANT GROVE.

Editor Union:

We are glad that we have such a worthy and competent man in the race for tax assessor as the Hon. L. B. Pounds.

Now, it seems almost useless to speak of Mr. Pounds to the people of Chilton county, as he is well known. But we wish to emphasize the fact that there is no man in the county more competent to fill the assessor's office than Mr. Pounds.

Look back over his history and see how true he has been to the people's cause. Why, two years ago, when the great powers of the enemy were concentrated here to defeat our Mr. L. H Reynolds, then it was that Mr. Pounds valiantly contended for the people's cause before such men as Judge Adams and others.

He has been fighting for the people's cause for years.

He has borne the crossfire of the enemy; he is bearing it yet, but he never yields to the enemy.

He has been assailed in various ways, still he is true. Then let us give him the nomination; he deserves it. Let us appreciate his labors for us in the past. All honor to the brave Mr. Pounds.

Then there is Sam W. Collins, candidate for clerk. We think he is the right material. We are glad we have such well qualified young men in our ranks. Let us honor Sam on the 26th with the nomination. We think he is worthy.

We hear of a beat barbecue in beat 3. Does the opposition hope to convert populists and republicans with a piece of beef? We believe the people are so solidly in line that they will win if all the oratory of the democrats was turned against them, and they had no speaker at all.

"TWO REPUBLICAN BOYS."

Editor Union:

I wish to say a few words by way of indorsement of that worthy old citizen, Alex G. Dake, who is now before the primary July 26th, 1904, asking you for the nomination of judge of probate.

I will not discuss the political side of the question, for in my opinion that thing is played out. Brother Dake is a high-toned Christian gentleman, a man of unquestioned integrity, the honored and competent county treasurer having been by order of the probate judge examined each year since he has been in office and never found wanting, but always up to date, never a single error in receipts or disbursements, with a perfect book neatly kept and ready at all times to account for every cent of money in his hands; in a word, he has been found faithful and true to every trust. Does this character of man appeal to the voters of Chilton county? Would it not be well for the voters of Chilton county to consider this matter of electing a probate judge from the standpoint of honesty and competency, and would it not be well for the men of this county to think seriously as to the man that may have charge of the estates of their widows and their children when they pass over the river?

And the best way to judge the future is by the past. If a man has been true and faithful then we can with hope look to him in the future. Brother Dake has been true and honest in all things and would in my judgment give general satisfaction to all our people, and we take no risk in voting for him and let us do so.

What do you say?

WILEY GORE.

Clanton, Ala., July 2, 1904.

Editor Union:

Please allow me space in your valuable paper to say to the many friends that have been soliciting me to make the race for county commissioner that after giving the matter due consideration I've decided not to do so. As I have been honored with two terms, I am willing to step aside and help some one else at the coming primary and general elections. I desire to thank the people for doing so much for me. The commissioner's office seems a small thing, but it means much to a man that is not able to do any work scarcely. Now, my friends, I'll step out with my conscience clear, as I've done everything in my power to treat all alike. I don't think that there is any one that can truthfully say that I have had any pets, so to speak. I've endeavored all along to treat all the people in my district just as though they were my neighbors, and I think there is many that can attest the same; as to my politics, it is a principle and never changes. I am with the common people to the last ditch if they don't get in the democratic party. I want to say right here that I'll never follow any man or set of men into the democratic party, and I would not vote for any man for any office if I thought he would go to the democratic party as a last resort. That is plain talk, but it is my sentiments. Let us try to nominate a good ticket and then every mother's son of us put our shoulders to the wheel, and have one of the biggest majorities for the people's ticket we've ever had. We can do it if we'll go to work. Again thanking the people for past favors, and wishing THE UNION much, I am yours very truly,

RUFUS C. RIGGINS.

PROVIDENCE.

Please allow me space to say a few words to our people. I am proud to see everything moving on so smoothly in the contest for the various county offices on July 26th. I am glad that the most of the candidates are heeding the resolution passed by the people's party committee on March 15th, wherein we recommended that candidates refrain from mud-slinging or abuse; but I am sorry to learn that we have one candidate whose business seems to be to try and stir up confusion, and thereby cause trouble in our ranks. I understand his argument (before what few people meet him at his appointments) is to speak of the misconduct of other candidates, and refers to a "trade ticket" or an understanding among candidates to nominate certain ones for certain positions. Now, I want to say that in my opinion all such slang had had its origin with our enemy, and is being talked mostly by the same set of fellows. Now, I can not say what give rise to the candidate above referred to becoming a candidate, but I've reason to believe that he was pulled out by some of the democrats of our county, and that for the purpose of what he is trying so hard to do, to cause confusion. I want to say to the friends of our ticket that I don't believe there has been any trade made in regard to nominating any certain ones, as all the rest of our candidates seem to be running on their own merits and not on the demerits of others. I further believe that this effort to stir up strife with our people is having the same effect that nearly all the democratic tricks have had in the past, and that is, pressing us closer together, and making us more united, so just let that gang go, do not try to kill them, but just give them a little more time and they will kill themselves, for of a fact we know they can not live longer than July 26th. So asking our people to stand united before and after the primary, I am yours very respectfully,

W. H. SHAW,
Ch'm'n People's Party Ex. Com.

CALERA.

The Fourth of July was celebrated at Calera in great style with a barbecue, ball game and goose pulling. A large crowd was there from adjoining counties, Chilton county being well represented. Before dinner the speakers of the day, Judge A. P. Longshore and Colonel Walter Oliver, held forth on "The Day We Celebrate." Judge Longshore spoke with his usual vim and eloquence and Colonel Oliver delivered some well rounded, graceful sentences. The saloons in town done a "land office business" in beer and "sich" especially the new firm of Collins, Raspberry & Co., while Abe Stein and G. H. Porter were not forgotten. G. H. Porter gave a half gallon of fine whiskey to the man who pulled the goose's head off, and that was the Hon. Buck Arledge, of Stumps Hills in Chilton county, who carried off the prize from a score of competitors. Hurrah for Buck. Altogether it was a great day for Calera.

NOTICE!

I am ready to lecture to or organize any alliance on short notice, and hold myself ready to attend all calls.

Editor Union:

I am by no means a politician and very seldom ever have anything in the papers to say about the candidates for the different positions they wish to hold in the county, but looking to the best interests of our county and being deeply interested in the cause that we espouse (the people's cause), I would like to say a few words in your paper in behalf of Mr. Enoch Adams, who is a candidate for treasurer. I've known Mr. Adams for quite a while, and since I first became acquainted with him I've at all times found him to be a good man morally, and strictly honest in everything he does or says. Well, let's see whether or not I am right. As I've often heard it said, "Honor to whom honor is due," and like any good populist, I believe it to be an unwritten tenet of the populist party; and on those grounds I think that Enoch Adams is entitled to all the support that we can give him. Why should I say this? Because his character so far as politics is concerned has borne and will still bear the strictest investigation. Did his father, Judge Adams, not turn from our party and flop himself over in the democratic fold after abusing the democrats in the bitterest of terms, and how about Enoch? Well, he didn't go to the democrats by a long shot, but on the other hand he has stood out manfully struggling on and on in the ranks in which he first enlisted. Now, Mr. Editor, there is not the shadow of a doubt but what Mr. Adams is qualified to fill the office as well as any one on the ticket, and in conclusion I want to say that for my part I've nothing to say against any of the other candidates, as all of them with the exception of one or two are my personal friends; but I think Mr. Adams is entitled to our support, and if nominated will be elected by a large majority. Success to THE UNION, to the party, and to Enoch Adams.

Respectfully,
J. D. GRANT.

Riderville, July 1, 1904.

Editor Union:

After reading several different letters of the people recommending the several different candidates, I come forward asking a small space in your paper to speak a few words in behalf of our friend, Mr. T. G. Milling. I've known him from school days to the present. He is fully competent to fill the office of tax assessor; has had several years' experience as deputy in this line of work, and has corrected several errors of long standing. Mr. Milling is a man that does not do things by halves; it has to be right or not at all. He has done as much for the people's party as any man in the county, and the voters are going to show him that they appreciate his labors by giving him a good round majority on July 26th.

ROCKY MOUNT.

Editor Union:

Allow me a small space in your paper. Everything is progressing fine, and candidates are plentiful. I see some one from beat 1 is speaking very high of old Bro. Dake as being our next probate judge. I've nothing hard to say about our good old friend, but I must say we, as a body of voters, must have some one in that office who is able to fight the battle for right and who can win the prize in this race. Some one said over there he was not going to vote for L. H. Reynolds because he didn't need it. We must agree that that is true, but, gentlemen, right here is the time to think. Let's vote for the man that the office and people seek, and not the man that seeks the office. "Oh," some one says, "he is a speculator." Let's step in his place and see what we would be. Now, good friends and readers of this paper, let us not stone Mr. Reynolds for being lucky; for it's no more than we would pray for if we pray at all. Now, my good friends, I have nothing to say about Stonewall Jack, because he has plenty of time to make himself known to the people and voters of this county. Friends, I've been living here within a mile and a half of Mr. Reynolds for ten years and have had personal dealings with him each year, and I must say he is a perfect gentleman. At the same time I am sorry for Mr. Reynolds because I am sure he has the hardest face to fight in the county, but I believe he will grin and endure it. With good wishes to every one and good luck to THE UNION.

A SONG FOR THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.

We tread a better earth to-day
Than that the fathers knew;
A broader sky line rounds away
To realms of deeper blue.
More ample is the human right,
More true the human ken;
The law of God has been a light
To lead the lives of men.

He led our generation on
In mist of smoldering fire;
To more than all the centuries gone
The marching years aspire.
Across the onward sweep of time
We strain our vision dim,
And all the ages roll and climb
To lose themselves in Him.

We gaze upon the suns past—
A blind and tumbling surge,
And slowly, from the weltering vast
Behold a low emerge.
The water seems to heave and sway
In chaos undenied,
Yet not a foam flake goes astray,
For He was wind and tide.

Oh, Purpose of the stumbling years,
Oh, Wistful Need and Hope.
Whereby in all the woven spheres
The atoms yearn and grope;
Flow through the wandering will of man
A tide of slow decree,
And merge our strivings in the plan
That draws the world to Thee.

ESTHER'S OPINION.

By HELEN FORREST GRAVES.

Mr. Martin had just come in to tea. It was one of those sultry summer evenings when the leaves hang stirlessly on the trees, and dull electric fires blaze along the east, forebodes of a storm.

It had been very hot all day, the farm-hands had lagged at their work on the lowland meadow, and all the world's wheels seemed to revolve as if they were weighted. Mr. Martin was very tired, and withal, a little cross.

Perhaps Mrs. Martin was tired, too. She, poor soul, had been up since four o'clock in the morning. She had washed, taken care of four cows' milk, prepared three meals for the hungry farmhands, been up in the quarry woods to search for a family of adventurous young turkey-chicks, soothed the sorrows of a teething baby, and mended up the suit of clothes which Betsey Blim, the tailoress, had declared "not worth a needleful o' thread!" because Thomas, her husband, had said that "willful waste was woeful want," and that there was a deal of wear in the suit yet, if only that was a stitch taken here and there.

But her cheeks were pink and her eyes sparkling when Thomas came in, for all the heaviness of her heart and the dull pain in her back, for little Esther had come home from boarding school.

Esther, the youngest sister of all, the darling of the family-circle from which Mrs. Martin came, the pet for whom they all had scraped and pinched so that she, at least, might have a "Boston education."

And Esther sat in the window-seat, grown into a blooming young woman, with bronze-brown hair lying in fluffy masses over her fair forehead, porcelain-blue eyes, and a dress all trimmed with ribbon bows.

"Look, Thomas!" cried Mrs. Martin, excitedly, "it's Essie! Essie come home two days before we expected her!"

"Yes, I see," said Hr. Martin, in the cold, measured tones which always dampened his wife's enthusiasm like so many drops of freezing water. "How do you do, Esther? Ruth, what are you putting cold chicken on the table for? Corned-beef is plenty I am sure. You had a great deal better save the chicken for the men's breakfast. Working folks have hearty oppetites."

"Esther is fond of cold chicken," whispered Mrs. Martin.

"No one need want anything better than good corned-beef," judicially pronounced Mr. Martin. "Put the chicken back into the pantry, and the apple jelly with it. Good stewed gooseberries are relish enough for anybody. We must economize in little things as well as large ones if we don't want to end our days in the poor-house."

And Mrs. Martin sorrowfully obeyed, while Essie watched her brother-in-law with large, grave eyes betokening inward surprise.

At the end of a week, Mr. Martin addressed his sister-in-law with serious purpose.

"Well, Esther," said he, "you've been here a week now."

"Yes," said Essie, "I've been here a week."

"A week is a good long visit," remarked Mr. Martin.

"It's long enough for some things," said Essie.

"Mrs. Martin thinks she would like to have you stay," went on Mr. Martin, after a puzzled glance at the blue, shining eyes. "And although, of course every one adds to the expense in a family like this, I've no objection to giving you a home, provided you are willing to earn it by hard work."

"Stop!" cried Essie, jumping up. "I haven't asked you for a home yet. And I don't mean to. And you are only making me the offer because Doctor Dorian says Ruth will break down unless she has a strong maid-servant to help her with the housework. But there is no money that would hire me to make myself such a drudge poor Ruth is."

"Hoity-toity!" said Mr. Martin. "Young woman, you don't consider whom you are talking to."

"Yes, I do," said Essie, with emphasis. "To a Bluebeard, to a stock, a stone, a man who is grinding his wife's life out on the pitiless wheel of money-making. No, I wouldn't live as Ruth does, not if you would put me in a palace!"

"Humph!" said he. "Fine ideas you have got at this fashionable boarding school of yours. Well, if you don't like my offer, you're not obliged to accept it. Be a fine lady, if you please, and see where it will land you."

By way of answer, Esie marched out of the room with all the dignity of a royal princess. She only stopped in the kitchen long enough to kiss Ruth, who was in the midst of a baking.

"Poor darling," said she, "how I wish I could carry you off with me. For stay, I won't!"

"Life is hard work, Essie, said Mrs. Martin, beginning to cry, in spite of herself; "and it's a woman's duty to help her husband."

"And I mean to help mine—when I have one," said Essie, blushing brightly. "But not by wearing myself out."

Mr. Martin shook his head.

"If Stephen Smith is foolish enough to marry that saucy gipsy, she'll lead him a pretty life," said he. "I wonder if she expects to sit on a satin sofa all her days, with a rose in her hand, and her hair frizzled, in that preposterous fashion, all over her eyes? But I warn 'em, they need never come to me for help! Esther has treated me with too much insolence for me ever to receive her again."

"I am sure she did not mean anything," said Mrs. Martin, apologetically.

"Well, then, her words belied her meaning," remarked Thomas Martin, grimly compressing his lips.

But Stephen Smith was apparently undaunted by the possibilities of ruin predicted by Farmer Martin, for he married Esther and went to the city to live, within three months.

"I'll give 'em a year to come back here and eat humble pie," said Martin vindictively.

"Oh, Thomas, don't talk so!" said his wife. "One would think you would be glad to have some evil befall them!"

"And so I should," said Martin, viciously grinding his teeth together. "That girl needs a lot of humbling, and I hope she'll get it."

Three years afterward there came one of those terrible droughts that undo a farmer's life-work in a season, and swept away his prospects as an autumn wind sweeps a sere forest. The cattle died, a pestilence broke out among the flock of sheep, which Thos. Martin had just brought a high wind blew his best barn over, and disaster stared him in the face on every side.

"It's no use talking," he said. "I can't meet this year's interest on the mortgage. The place will have to go."

"Oh, Thomas!" groaned Mrs. Martin, who, poor soul, now lay all day on a hard wooden lounge, and groaned to see how woefully she was needed at the helm.

"I can't help it," said Martin. "Everything is against me."

"It's only five hundred dollars," said Mrs. Martin. "You might borrow it."

"Who'd lend to me, I'd like to know?" said Martin, remembering with a sigh how he had hardened his face against every humble suppliant in the golden days of his prosperity.

"There's Esther's husband," suggested Ruth. "I've heard that he is doing well in Boston. And, after all, Esther's my own sister."

Mr. Martin's features contracted into a hideous grimace. Of all the bitter cups which circumstances had held to his lips of late this was the bitterest.

But it had to be swallowed. There was no help for it.

"I didn't suppose Smith's folks lived as genteel as this," said he to himself, as a neat maid led him across an octagonal vestibule, floored with black-and-red marble, and fragrant with flowers, under the golden fringe of an antique portiere, into a large, tastefully-furnished room, where the singing birds, the open piano, the low satin sofa all betokened no lack of money.

Yes—Mr. Smith was at home. He had not yet gone to the store, and presently he came in, waving welcomings to the man who had married Esther's sister.

"Lend you a thousand dollars?" said he. "Of course we can lend you a thousand dollars. What is money for if not to help each other with. Oh, yes. We've a snug little sum laid up in the bank, and we live very comfortably. My business? Yes, it's tolerable, but it never got us all these things," glancing at the soft arabesques of the carpet, the graceful folds of the crimson silk curtains, and the easel filled with proof engravings. "That is my wife's doing."

"Eh?" said Mr. Martin, staring around him.

"Yes," said Smith, with a certain, quiet satisfaction. "Essie is an artist, you know—a designer. She invents patterns for the paper-hangers and upholsterers. They are glad to pay her fifty dollars a week."

"Fifty dollars a week!" exclaimed Thomas Martin. "Why that's more—fifty dollars is, I mean—than poor Ruth made by all her poultry for a year. Well, I never!"

In all his life he had never respected Essie as her respected her now.

"She has money laid up," said Stephen Smith. "And if she's the woman I think she is, she won't grudge it to help her sister's husband in a pinch."

Gall and bitterness—gall and bitterness! But, thought poor Martin, with a sigh, how was Stephen to know all that had come and gone?

Essie's light step, on the passageway, sounded at this instant; and she came in, dressed in a picturesque brown linen blouse; her hair still shading her forehead, like a fringe of floss silk, after the old, graceful fashion.

"Yes," she said, brightly, when her brother-in-law's errand was stated to her; "of course you shall have it. I owe you as much as that, I think, Thomas, were it only to erase from your memory that last scene of our parting. How defiant and insolent it was to be sure!" and she laughed the sweetest of mellow laughter. "But I insist upon it, still, that my theory was correct; a woman can work, without becoming a drudge."

"Perhaps she can," slowly and unwillingly admitted Thomas Martin—"perhaps she can! But it didn't use to be so, in my mother's days."

And he sighed to think of poor Ruth, broken down in the meridian of her days, by the cruel necessities that drive the wife of an American farmer to her doom. Was it his own fault? Perhaps it was.

Essie's thousand dollar loan was the straw which saved him from figurative drowning. He paid the interest, bought a new flock of merino sheep, and weathered the storm.

And the next year when Essie came to the farm to assist her sister, for the first time she found Ruth sitting on the piazza, and watching the little lambs play in the sunshine with listless, heavy eyes.

"Yes," said Ruth, "I can't work any more. But Thomas is very kind. He don't grudge the hired girl's wages, and he is always saying he wished he had taken more care of me in the old times. But it's too late now. You were right, Essie, when you said you wouldn't stay on here, and help with the housework."

"Yes," said Essie, fondling the thin hand which lay on the arm of the rocking-chair, "I think I was right."—New York Weekly.

STANLEY'S CAREER.

THE AFRICAN EXPLORER'S LIFE A ROMANCE OF HISTORY.

Exploration of the Congo by Livingstone's Successor Led to Partition of Africa—How He Met Dr. Livingstone in the Dark Continent.

Sir Henry Morton Stanley's life was a romance. Born in Denbigh, Wales, Jan. 28, 1841, into obscurity so dense that his real name, John Rowlands, was for a long time a mystery; into poverty so great that some years of his boyhood were spent in the St. Asaph Union workhouse, he rose to a famous journalist, an explorer of world-wide eminence, a legislator in the house of commons of Great Britain and a social figure in the most eminent circles of the world.

He was about 16 when he first came to this country, shipping as a cabin boy on a schooner bound for New Orleans. It was there that he met his first friend and protector, Henry Morton Stanley, a merchant, who is said to have adopted him, and whose name he took.

Mr. Stanley died intestate and the lad was thrown upon his own resources. When the civil war broke out he enlisted in the Confederate army, but being taken prisoner at Pittsburg Landing, won his liberty by enlisting in the Federal navy. For his bravery in swimming through a storm of shot and shell to attach a hawser to a captured Confederat vessel he was promoted to be acting ensign on the ironclad Ticonderoga.

His public career began with the Abyssinian expedition of 1867-68, in which he acted as a newspaper correspondent. Succeeding in sending the first news of the close of the campaign to London, he attracted the attention of the New York Herald, which gave him a number of roving commissions. On one of these he ascended the Nile, on another he interviewed the chiefs of the Cretan revolution (1868-69) and he was sent eventually to Spain in time to witness the scenes that followed after the departure of Queen Isabella from Madrid.

In his book, "How I Found Livingstone," he has told how, on Oct 16, 1869, a sudden telegram called him from Madrid to Paris, and how the proprieter of the Herald asked him:

"Where do you think Livingstone is?"

"I really do not know, sir."

"Do you think he is alive, and that he can be found; and I am going to send you to find him."

And these were the instructions he received, as recorded by himself: "Draw £1000 now, and when you have gone through that, draw another thousand, and when that is spent, draw another thousand, and when you have finished that, draw another thousand, and so on; but find Livingstone."

Mr. Stanley did not hesitate. His journalistic training had accustomed him to implicit obedience. Just as he had done when the Herald had given him 10 minutes to consider whether or not he would accept the mission to Abyssinia, so now he merely drew a long breath, and agreed to find Livingstone living or Livingstone's bones dead.

It was not until December, 1870, that Stanley sailed from Bombay to Zanzibar, which he reached on Jan. 6. 1871.

Stanley found that he would have to hire a body of 200 men for at least a year and carry with him immense stores of cotton sheetings, brass wire and beads, which take the place of specie among the barbarous tribes along the way.

Each of his men was engaged for $6 a year and provided with a flintlock musket, powder horn, bullet mould, knife, hatchet and powder and ball for 200 rounds. To cross the rivers along the way two boats, one seating 20 and the other six men, were procured.

Stanley had been fortunate enough to secure the services of three men, who had been respectively in the expeditions of Speke, Grant and Burton. Under their guidance the journey from the coast to Ujiji was safely made, though under great hardships and peril. At Unyanyembe they had passed a caravan which had been sent to the relief of Livingstone by Sir John Kirk. At that place Stanley had been obliged to leave many of his men who were sick, including Shaw. At last, on Nov. 10, 1871, after a march of 236 days, the expedition, with flags flying and guns firing, entered the town of Ujiji, where they were speedily surrounded by a crowd of wondering natives.

Suddenly, Stanley heard a voice on his right say in English: "Good morning, sir," and a black man announced himself as Susi, the servant of Dr. Livingstone.

"What! Is Dr. Livingstone here?"

"Yes, sir."

"Are you sure?"

"Sure, sure, sir. Why, I leave him just now."

And so Stanley, scourging himself to keep down his furious emotions, arrived at the head of his caravan before a semicircle of Arab magistrates, in front of whom stood an old white man, with a gray beard.

Stanley walked deliberately up to him, took off his hat and said:

"Dr. Livingstone, I presume."

"Yes," said he, with a kind smile, lifting his cap slightly.

Then Stanley explained his mission. It was a great day for the old explorer. Stanley bore letters from his children.

"Ah!" said the old man. "I have waited patiently for years for letters."

Livingstone and Stanley became fast friends, and there is no doubt that the older man exerted a great influence over the younger. Together they explored the northern extremity of Tanganyika. Livingstone believed that the Albert lake had some communication with the Nile system, but one result of this exploring tour was to disprove this theory. On March 12, 1872, Livingstone and Stanley parted, and the latter began his return march to the coast, which he reached on May 8, 1872, after encountering terrific floods and storms.

When the news of the success of the expedition reached civilization is was hardly credited at first, but Stanley's arrival in London with Livingstone's letters and diaries put an end to all doubt.

Stanley's next visit to Africa was as a war correspondent, accompanying Sir Garnet Wolseley's expedition to Coomassie. On reaching the island of St. Vincent from Ashanti, in 1874, he first heard that Livingstone was dead, and that the body was on its way to England. Stanley himself was in time to attend the funeral in Westminster Abbey.

Standing by the open grave he formed the resolution to take up the work which Livingstone had been unable to accomplish.

One day Mr. Edward Levy Lawson, now Lord Burnham, editor and proprietor of the Daily Telegraph of London, asking him what work had been left undone by him on the continent of Africa, he replied:

"The outlet of Lake Tanganyika is undiscovered, we know little or nothing of Lake Victoria, and therefore the sources of the Nile are still unknown. Moreover, the western half of the African continent is still a blank."

Stanley added that if he survived long enough he would accomplish all this work. Thereupon a cable was sent to New York asking the Herald if it would join the London Daily Telegraph in sending Stanley again to Africa. A laconic "yes" was speedily flashed across the wires. Immediately the fitting out of the expedition was begun. On Aug. 16, 1874, Stanley left England for Zanzibar, where the Anglo-American expedition was finally organized with a total force of 355 persons, including 36 women, 10 boys and four Europeans, Stanley, the two Brothers Pocock and Frederick Barker. The line of march covered nearly half a mile.

On Feb. 27, 1875, the south end of Lake Victoria Nyanza was reached after great difficulties, repeated attacks from the natives and some losses by death and desertion. In his boat, the Lady Alice Stanley accompanied by 11 men, circumnavigated the lake.

Livingstone, in his researches between Lakes Nyassa and Tanganyika had proved the existence of a large river flowing to the north under the native name of Lualaba. He had imagined it to be the Nile, an opinion generally accepted by geographers.

Stanley, sailing down the river from the furthest point which Livingstone had reached to the Atlantic, identified it with the Congo, and so proved the existence of a magnificent equatorial waterway in the very heart of Africa—the second largest river in the world.

This discovery filled up an enormous blank in the map of Africa. Its political importance cannot be overestimated. It led directly to the founding of what is now the Congo Free State, and indirectly to the scramble for Africa among the European powers which has now left but an insignificant portion of the continent unpartitioned.

In January, 1878, Stanley returned to London, where he published the story of his adventures and discoveries in "Through the Dark Continent."

In 1879 he again went to Africa to found, under the auspices of the King of the Belgians, the Congo State—a work which engaged all his energies until 1888.

His last expedition to Africa was for the ostensible purpose of succoring Emin Pacha, whose position in the Equartorial Provinces, since the abandonment of the Sudan by Egypt, was supposed to be one of great peril. The supposition was found to be an error, but the book "Through Darkest Africa," in which Stanley told his story of adventures, was received with great popular favor.

Of his later years the record is less spectacular. His marriage to Miss Dorothy Tennant in 1890, his American lecture tour, his election to the British parliament in 1895, his acceptance of the title of G. C. B. in 1899 kept him intermittently in the public eye, but even in parliament he was content not to cut any conspicuous figure.

Senator Nelson Stops Interruptions.

An old friend from Minnesota came down to Washington the other day to visit Senator Nelson. In the room of the committee on commerce they had a good long chat of old times, during which Mr. Nelson told about an experience he once had on the hustings.

"There was a man in my audience," said he, "who insisted on asking questions. I told him to wait, I would answer his question after a little. But I had not more than started again with my speech than he interrupted again. This performance was repeated two or three times. When I left the stage, walked down to his seat, grabbed him by the throat, and choked him till he signaled that he had had enough.

"Sitting on the platform where I spoke was a minister of the gospel. 'That fellow,' said this minister, as I returned to deliver my speech without further annoyance, 'is the same scamp who has frequently interrupted me in my pulpit. I am glad you have shown me an effective way to treat him.'"—Washington Post.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON COMM FOR JULY 10.

Subject: Jeroboam's Idolatry. I K xii., 25-33—Golden Text, I John 21—Memory Verses, 28-30—Co tary on the Day's Lesson.

I. Improvements made (v. 25). "Then Jeroboam built." After made king Jeroboam immediately measures to establish himself in his dom. There were bright prospects him. "Shechem." This city was and fortified and thus made it to royal residence. But he soon remov capital to Tirzah, a few miles Kings 14:17; 15, 21), and this re capital until Omri removed it to "Mount Ephraim." See R. V. N gle mountain, but the hill Ephraim, extending from Be plains of Jezreel. It is the most beautiful part of the land out from thence." Shechem was of operations in the building other cities. "Penuel." Like the Jordan, near the fords where Jacob wrestled with the 32:30), and whose tower and in the time of the Judges destroyed (Judg. 8:17). Jeroboam regarded it as an important manding the great caravan further East, and

II. Idolatrous worship (vs. 26-31). 26. "Said in his heart not speak out his real motives have been ashamed to have done it would have been poor policy. reasons were in his heart, the other argument to the people —David." Jeroboam was exercising above principle. Josephus says was forced on the king's mind by proach of the feast of Tabernacles which time it had been usual ple to go up in great numbers to lem, and to live there for some "To offer sacrifices" (R. V.). He saw at once that the religious man's nature is a great power into account in politics. Human ing, Jeroboam's fear was, it must be fessed, well founded. "Shall kill When they have had time to step taken. Such revulsion of not uncommon. "Uneasy lies the that wears a crown." Jeroboam tified himself as he did not fear now another danger seems to arise throws a gloom over his prospects. ality, however, there was no such for God had promised to establish kingdom on condition that he would Him (1 Kings 11:38), and God's was sure.

28. "Took counsel." With his lors, or the heads of the nation who helped him to the throne. They were dently like the king in worldly plans. "Made two calves." Jeroboam residence in Egypt had made him with the calf worship so largely there, and this, doubtless, had much with the erection of these golden besides, the people had already become customed to the sight of the figures oxen in their religious ceremonial presence as supporters of the molten at the temple in Jerusalem. These were not set up to be worshiped as any more than were the ark and cred shrines at Jerusalem, but Jeroboam saw that he must provide for the religious instincts of his people, and at once duced a system of his own creation. though he did not design to lead the ple into idolatry, yet he deliberately the second commandment, and "from shiping God under a false and unauthorized form, the people gradually learned worship other gods altogether, and sanctuaries at Bethel and Dan prepared the way for the temples of Ashtaroth Baal at Samaria and Jegreel." "Of gold." It was probably overlaid with gold. much." The sense intended is probably given in the margin of the Revised Version, "Ye have gone up long enough." Jeroboam's argument was, "You have chosen a new king, choose also new places of worship." This was an appeal to the easily love of ease.

29. "Bethel." A city in the central southern part of the new kingdom. "Dan." Formerly called Laish, situated in the northern part of the kingdom. There was policy in choosing these places, as they had been associated with religious worship in ancient times. See Gen. 12:8; 28:18; 1 Sam. 10:3; Judg. 18:30. 30. "Became a sin." The first and second commandments were both broken; the service of God was degraded, and the people were led into idolatry, including the obscene rites practiced at idol shrines. "Even unto Dan." There are different views as to the meaning here. (1) It may mean that the people went there to worship at once; or (2) it may be intended to show that the people preferred to turn from all associations with Jerusalem and therefore went to far off Dan on the northern frontier. 31. "Made an house." He built a temple or sanctuary at each of the two cities where the calves were set up. "Of high places." Hebrew worship were originally built on high places and in groves on hill tops. "Made priests," etc. See R. V. Jeroboam's sin was not that he selected persons of low birth or bad character to act as priests, but that he selected them from among the people without reference to tribes, thereby annulling the divine plan that they should be of the tribe of Levi. "Sons of Levi." Jeroboam would no doubt have been glad to have retained the Levitical priesthood, but they probably opposed his designs and were evidently banished by Jeroboam, who went over in a body to Rehoboam.

III. A feast instituted (vs. 32, 33). "In the eighth month." November. This was to take the place of the feast of Tabernacles, one of the three great Jewish feasts, which, by divine appointment, was held on the 15th of the seventh month in Jerusalem. Had Jeroboam provided no other attraction many of his subjects would have visited Rehoboam's capital at the time. The reason generally given for changing the time from the seventh to the eighth month, in defiance of the law (Lev. 23:39, 41), is that "in the northern districts of his kingdom the grain ripened a month later than in southern Judah, so that this festival was to be kept at the time of ingathering of the fruit of the land." "He offered," etc. "He went up into the altar." Altars were ascended either by steps or by an inclined plane. The king assisted at the dedication, thus imitating Solomon, who had advised." The entire system of Jeroboam receives its condemnation in these words. His main fault was that he left the true God and a worship where all was divinely authorized for ceremonies and services, and set up one which were wholly of his own devising. He placed in difficult circumstances. He met them with the arts of a politician, not with the single-mindedness of a saint.

Four years ago the working day in all French factories was one of ten hours; a year later it was eleven hours and then it came down to ten and a half; but from the 1st of April the working day will be one of ten hours. It is stated that the same rate of wages will be paid for ten hours as was paid when twelve hours were worked.

A SERMON FOR SUNDAY

AN ELOQUENT DISCOURSE BY THE REV. W. T. BEST.

"Faded Leaves," the Subject of a Helpful Talk—The Endless Variety of Leaves—All Must Stand the Storms of Life Alike and Come to the Same End.

CHASM FALLS, N. Y.—The following sermon, entitled "Faded Leaves," was preached here by the Rev. William T. Best. He took as his text: "We all do fade ... as a leaf."—Isa. 64:6.

Nature has once more been disrobed of her green foliage, "and the Stork in the heaven knoweth her appointed time and the Turtle and the Crane and the Swallow have gone to a warmer region. While looking from my study window, I noticed the leaves falling and the children playing among the dead leaves that lay upon the ground. I then began to think of the past year. I remembered distinctly its birth when we knelt together in the Watch-meeting and reconsecrated ourselves to the Master. The thoughts of its youth revived those pleasant memories that can be appreciated only by one living in the Adirondacks. But, oh, how changed everything appears to-day! The same river glides by the door and the same mountains are on either side of the house, yet a cloud of sadness hovers o'er me as I watch the leaves fall from the trees. "Ah! these are harbingers of approaching storms; the indication that another summer's warmth and beauty is about to be succeeded by the chill desolation of winter."

It is so difficult for us to understand religious truths that God was obliged to draw them out in diagram upon the natural world. Therefore a minister may go to almost any branch of nature and find a sermon. "Go to the ant," says the wise man Solomon. Consider the "Lillies of the field," says Christ. Rain and brook, beast and bird, day and night, the changing seasons; all abound with spiritual lessons, and the faded leaves, blown wildly about by the wilder winds of autumn, whirl up in our faces, and before our doors, seeming to say, "What about us?" God has commissioned us to carry a message to man, and mingling with the dirge of autumn, comes the sadder dirge of the Prophet Isaiah, "We all do fade as a leaf."

I. The Endless Variety of Leaves.

Though there are so many different kinds of leaves in the world it is doubtful if there are two leaves of any class exactly alike. Then all species of leaves are not found on one tree. The king of white oaks may witness 600 years of Canadian history; the Californian pine may have existed centuries before "Leif the Lucky" discovered Vinland; the Parliament Oaks has seen 1500 years of European progress; the cedars of Lebanon date their birth from the time of the flood and the Boabab of Senegal claim to be over 5000 years old; yet the leaves they have scattered are but as a drop to the ocean compared to the number that have fallen to the earth.

"God hath made of one blood all nations of men," and though there are so many different races of mankind it is doubtful if there could be found two men of any race exactly alike. They differ as do the leaves. Especially is this true from a religious standpoint for all men do not hold the same religious belief. The main thing, however, is for all to belong to Christ. Let the fig leaf utter its voice of warning, the maple suggest its sweetness and the olive bring its message of peace; yet there are times in every life when naught can be found but the weeping willow.

Perishing, perishing! Hark, how they call us;
Bring us your Saviour, oh, tell us of Him!
We are so weary, so heavily laden,
And with long weeping our eyes have grown dim.

"Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."

II. Some Leaves Are Higher Up in This World Than Others, But All Must Stand the Storms of Life Alike and Come to the Same End.

Some people are determined to go up in this world, even if they go down in the next. Men lose their health trying to get wealth, and then lose their wealth trying get health. God has a place for every man in this world, whether it be in the ministry, at the work bench, or following the plow. Let each man find his right place and there be at his best for God. It is useless for a leaf at the lower part of the tree to be trying to get to the top, but in each leaf in its proper place goes to make a perfect tree. "For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office; so we, being many, are one body in Christ." Let us learn, therefore, in "whatsoever state we are therewith to be content," "running with patience the race set before us," and we shall as surely hear the "well done" as the man with the greatest number of talents.

The millionaire can wear but one suit of clothes, sleep in one bed and eat but one meal at a time. In many respects his riches only increase his troubles, and it is a mistake to suppose that he is not subject to many of the disappointments common to men. On the other hand, let us not try to throw a romance about the poor man's lot. Poverty is hard, cruel, unrelenting. But as surely as the different kinds of weather are a necessity to the leaves, so surely are the storms of life necessary to our highest good; for

"If all were easy, if all were bright,
Where would the cross be?
Where would the night?
But in the hardness, God gives to you,
Chances of proving that you are true."

Death places the leaves all on the same level. Said a widowed lady, whose husband fills a drunkard's grave, as she stood by the grave of the wealthy saloon keeper who had taken his money: "Ah! you are on a level with my husband now." Yes, death places us all on a level. Where are now the vast armies of the Assyrians, Grecians, Persians, Romans? As with the warrior so with the peaceful, as with the rich so with the poor. Millions have gone, millions more are on their journey.

"The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth ere gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour.
The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

III. The Decay of the Leaf is Sometimes Hastened by External Circumstances.

It may be affected by insects, excessive moisture, excessive cold, etc., etc. Then often the leaf is plucked from the tree while in full bloom.

"The wicked shall not live out half their days." God gives every man so long to live, if he takes care of his body (which is the temple of the Holy Ghost) he will probably live out his appointed days. Yet how often we see people called from time into eternity just at the moment when their brightest hopes are about to be realized. Moses has led Israel through the wilderness. He has borne up under their murmurings and backslidings, and at times he has had to stand alone when it seemed as though his shoulders could not carry the care and responsibility placed upon them. Yet he has looked forward to this glad moment as the time when his character shall be vindicated and he shall lead the people, triumphantly lead the people into the Promised Land. But now the command comes from heaven, "Moses, ascend Nebo to die!" Ah! this is tragedy surpassing anything Shakespearean, yet it occurs almost every day. A vessel is wrecked at sea, a train has jumped the track, a hotel has taken fire and men and women just on the eve of realizing their highest ambitions are snatched from this into another world.

IV. The Leaves Fade in Concert Though They Fall One by One.

"One cannot count the number of plumes which those frosts are plucking from the hills." The aisles of the woods will be covered with a beautiful carpet of many colors. The imagination can scarcely comprehend the number of leaves that are falling. The grave is the great city. It has the largest population, the longest streets, the greatest number of hands, billions of eyes, though they see not. Kings and queens are there, orators, statesmen, yea, men of every rank and condition, yet it is the great city of silence. Neither work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom are there. The multitude of the dying and the dead are as the autumnal leaves drifting under our feet to-day.

"One by one, one by one, we shall soon, yes soon be there."

V. Let Us Proceed to Inquire, How Do the Leaves Fade?

1. They fade naturally. It is what constantly occurs. After the summer is gone and the fruits are fully ripe, they change their color, lose their interesting hue and drop in rapid succession to the ground. "Man that is born of a woman hath but a short time to live, and is full of misery. He cometh up, and is cut down like a flower; he fleeth as it were a shadow, and never continueth in one stay. In the midst of life we are in death," and science teaches that we are more apt to die than to live, all our tendencies are toward death, and it is one continual struggle to keep soul and body together. Where are now the builders of Babel? Abraham and his seed? David and Solomon? Daniel, the prophets, the apostles and the great men of the past? Only remembered by what they have done. They being dead are still speaking. The serpent comes to the sinner, coils about his body, presses his heart tightly, and then comes the awful sting. The same serpent comes to the Christian. But oh, how changed! The Christian, as he looks him in the eyes, can cry out: "Oh, death, where is thy sting?" "I have been dying for many years, now I shall begin to live."

2. They Fade Gradually.

The different periods of life are compared to the revolving seasons of the year. Childhood and youth when life is all expectation and hope, are like a beautiful May morning when the sun shines brightly, and the dew is upon the flowers, and everything is beautiful and lovely. Nature is bursting her bars and is giving promise of the unfolded splendors of a summer's glory yet to come. But oh, how quickly time passes by! The boys and girls of yesterday are the men and women of to-day. Then, for none of us is there such a thing as an ever-enduring manhood. "We pursue our course, from childhood, with its vigor and beauty, to age with its feebleness and decay, with the unfailing continuance of the rounding seasons. Our march is an uninterrupted one from the cradle to the grave." But, oh, how we shrink at the thought of going down the western horizon of our physical strength! The leaves, which a few days ago felt the first touch of the frost have day by day been changing in tint. The work was not completed in a day. No, it has been going on gradually and after awhile, leaf after leaf, they will fall to the ground. So with you and me. From day to day we hardly notice the change, but the frosts have touched us.

VI. There is a Greater Beauty and Glory Attached to the Leaf in Its Fading and Dying Condition Than at Any Time in Its Life.

Along the lake shores and river banks, and up the slopes of the mountains, "there is an inexpressible mingling of gold, and orange, and crimson, and saffron, now sobering into drab and maroon, now flaming into solferino and scarlet." In the morning the forests look as if they were transfigured, "and in the evening hour . . . as the sunset had burst and dropped upon the leaves." Some of the mountains appear to be all on fire, as if they were submerged in the glory of the Lord. Said Rev. C. C. Townsend, as he stood by the parsonage gate and looked upon the scene: "Isn't that beautiful? I must bring my wife up here to see that foliage." How often while driving along the road we notice a tree where the leaves have faded at the first touch of the frost, all turning a russet brown. "No one stops to study them. They are gathered in no vase. They are hung on no wall." No one cares anything at all about them. Such is the death of the wicked. They do not live out half their days, but pass away into blackness, and darkness, and despair without a ray of light to cheer the gloom. But, thank God, such is not the death of the Christian, for, "the path of the just is as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day." What a beautiful sight it is behold a father and mother in Israel who have spent their lives in the service of Christ come down to cross the river. Oh, what halo of glory there is about them! What words of peace and joy and comfort proceed from their lips, and how strangely near the Holy Spirit is as the Angels gently loose the silver cord.

"Fade, fade, each earthly joy,
Jesus is Mine."

And the fading body flutters and falls downward as the leaf, while "the spirit returns to God who gave it." Oh, that in this sense, too, we may all fade with the beauty and glory of the leaf.

VII. The Leaves Fall Only to Rise Again.

It is one of the laws of nature that nothing is really lost. Things change their condition, but exist in another form. In the juice and sap and life of the tree the leaves will come up again. Next May the South wind will blow the resurrection "trumpet and they will rise." So with our loved ones who sleep in Jesus. They shall not all sleep, but they shall be changed. "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him. For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord." Hallelujah! Hallelujah!

VIII. In the Heavenly Jerusalem the Leaves Shall Never Fade.

"Soon will the shadows of earth's life be past,
Sorrow and partings be over at last;
Soon shall we meet in the 'Mansions of Day,'
Meet where our loved ones can ne'er fade away."

When Ezekiel foretold the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom he spoke of them under the figure of trees growing on a bank whose leaves should not wither, but be for medicine. When John saw in apocalyptic vision the heavens opened, and the new Jerusalem descending down from God out of heaven. He saw in the midst of the street and on either side of the river, the tree of life, and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations.

"There the sun never sets and the leaves never fade,
There the righteous forever shall shine like the stars,
In that beautiful city of gold."

Alcoholism is extremely rare in the Italian army. In 1901, the latest for which figures are available, only twenty-five cases were admitted to the hospitals.

"FIRST BOY IN."

Shirt's in a knot an' it ain't on right?
Hair's p-plastered against my head?
Lips bub-bub blue an' my fingers white?
Huh, I reckon my eyes is red!
Teeth ch-chatter an' I l-look sick?
Wob-wob-wobble-in' with my chin?
Just g-got out o' th' cr-cr-crick.
Br-r-r-r! But I was th' first one in!

Say! Th' was me an' th' Gr-Green boys,
Hickesey Murphy an' Bub-bill Brown—
Fib-b-b-but my teeth make a lot o' noise!
We wen-wen-went to th' edge o' town
Where th' will-willows grows up so thick;
I sh-sh-shed to th' very skin.
Then gr-r-r-r! I was in th' crick.
Out again—but th' first one in!

Bub-bill ast me if it fel-felt cold.
"No," I sa-said, "it's warm an' nice."
Big a li-liq as I ever told—
Hon-hon-honest, it's worse 'n ice,
All th' others, they di-dived quick;
I got out on th' bank to grin.
Gee! They sputtered there in th' crick!
Just th' same, I's th' first in.

Ma called to me when I started out—
Said to sta-stay on our own street.
She'll want to know what I been about—
I'm going home to ge-get some heat.
Tee-teeth chatter, my hair is slick,
Trem-trem-trembie-in' in my chin—
Say! It's dandy dow-down th' crick!
Honest, I was th' first one in.

Multiplication of Bacilli.

In our laboratories, under suitable conditions of food and warmth, a bacillus splits in half an hour into two parts, each of which splits again in half an hour, and so on, and it has been estimated that a single bacillus, if given similar conditions in nature, would, within a week, give rise to progeny numerous enough to fill the Atlantic ocean. Such overbalancing is largely prevented by the protozoa, which feed upon the bacteria, increasing as they increase, and decreasing as this food supply gives out. The protozoa, in turn, are eaten by animals like the worms and shellfish, these by others, and so on, the balance of nature being so delicate that no form increases disproportionately for any length of time, although, like the locust plague, or the California fruit-tree scale, or the gypsy moth, some forms may occasionally predominate.—Gary N. Calkins, in Century.

646 STILL MISSING

Immigrant Ship Strikes Hidden Rock and Sinks with Many on Board.

ONLY TWENTY-SEVEN SURVIVE.

Struggle for Seats in Life Boats Responsible for Some of the Fatality.

Captain Goes Down with Ship.

Over seven hundred Danish and Norwegian emigrants bound for New York are believed to have been drowned in the north Atlantic on June 28th. Out of nearly 800 souls on board the Danish steamer Norge, which left Copenhagen June 22d, only 27 are known to be alive, and for the rest no hope is held out.

When last seen the Norge was sinking where she struck on the Islet of Rockall, whose isolated head raises itself from a deadly Atlantic reef, some 290 miles off the west coast of Scotland.

Early on the morning of last Tuesday the Norge, which was out of her course in heavy weather, ran on the Rockall reef which in the distance looks like a ship under full sail. The Norge was quickly backed off, but the sea poured in through a rent in her bows.

The emigrants who were awaiting breakfast below ran on deck. The hatchways were scarcely built for the hundreds of souls and became clogged.

The Norge quickly began to go down by the head. Eight boats were lowered and into these the women and children were hurriedly put. Six of these boats smashed against the side of the Norge and their helpless inmates were caught up by the heavy seas.

Two boat loads got safely away from the side of the sinking ship, and many of the emigrants who were left on board seized life belts, threw themselves into the sea and were drowned.

Captain Gundel, so say the survivors, stood on the bridge of the doomed vessel until it could be seen no more.

The Norge foundered suddenly and some 600 terrified emigrants were thrown into the water or drawn with the sinking ship.

Those who could swim tried to reach the boats, but these were already too full and their occupants beat off the drowning with oars.

The boats kept together for some hours. Practically all of their occupants were passengers and were not used to handling such craft. The boat occupied by the survivors landed at Grimsby, and was a life boat.

One account says that three boats were successfully launched, the other two holding about ten persons.

The life boat made faster progress and fell in with the Salvia. What became of the other boats is not yet known.

The rescue of those in the life boat took place at 8 o'clock on the morning of June 29th, the survivors consisting of twenty men, one of them a seaman, six women and a girl.

Of 774 souls on board the Danish steamer Norge, 128 are known to have been saved. For the missing 646 persons small hopes are entertained.

The enormous death roll which was feared at the first news of the wreck has been decreased by 102, that number of survivors after many privations having been landed at Stornoway.

The women of South Boston have succeeded in preventing the granting of a license for a dance hall at City Point.

Air Ship Injured by Vandals.

Some time during Monday night the gas bag of Santos Dumont's air ship was cut and slashed in such a manner as to preclude all possibility of its being repaired to allow an ascension on July 4th.

The work was apparently done with a jack knife. There are twenty long rips in the bag, and Professor Meyers, who has charge of the aeronautic contests, declares that it will take at least two weeks to repair the damage.

DELEGATES. KILLED.

Chicago Limited Runs into an Open Switch—Twenty Killed.

The Chicago Limited on the Wabash railroad was wrecked Sunday night at Litchfield, Ill. The train struck an open switch and was overturned and seven of the nine cars were burned.

Twenty persons were burned in the second and third coaches and some forty were inured.

Among the dead are Joseph Barder, delegate from North Dakota, and I. R. Mills, internal revenue collector at Decatur, Ill.

The engine after running into the switch struck a string of freight cars and with the first three coaches was piled in a heap across the track and caught fire at once.

The track was reported clear at the last station, and as the train was running about fifty miles an hour the open switch was not noticed. No information can be obtained as to who is responsible for the accident.

Three of the injured have since died.

"Some one turned that switch at Litchfield," said President Ramsey, of the Wabash, in speaking of the derailment of the train. "Whether it was one who had a spite against the railroad, or who was merely crazy, I do not know. Certainly it seems that no human spite against the road could be so bitter as to be willing to sacrifice the lives that were lost or to cause the suffering that has resulted."

LOSS $10,000.

Alexander City Has Another Big Fire.

Saturday night about 10 o'clock fire broke out in the dry goods store of George W. Sealey, at Alexander City, and for a while it seemed that the whole block, including eight stores, was doomed, but the fire was held within the building in which it originated. The fire totally consumed the large Pearson building, including the Truett saloon. Three attorney's offices and liraries and the Kennedy shoe shop on the second floor were totally destroyed. The Adams building, on the east and north of the building destroyed, was considerably damaged. Many stocks of goods in the fire vicinity have been badly damaged on account of removal. Those involved in the fire are as follows:

H. W. Pearson, building loss, $4,000, insurance said to be $3,000. Truett saloon, nearly a total less, covered by insurance. George W. Sealey, total loss, covered by insurance. Mamie Whatley, millinery, loss about $500, insurance $300. Damage to the S. P. Adams store building adjoining, something like $1,000, covered by insurance. City Grocery Company, T. B. Turner, tinner and hardware; C. C. Adams, Jr., Adams & Lightfoot, all had bad removal losses, all covered by insurance. The total loss to property will aggregate about $10,000, with something like $7,000 insurance.

BRYAN'S ANSWER

Deemed to be an Insult—A Dramatic Scene.

Constant reports to the effect that Bryan would bolt the nominee of the convention led several delegates to go to Mr. Bryan and see him personally. Mr. Bryan was asked the direct question by Colonel Holt, of North Carolina:

"Will you support the nominee?"

Mr. Bryan placed his hand upon his heart and replied:

"I do not ask any person or party how I shall vote. This is responsible only."

Colonel Holt said:

"Mr. Bryan, I supported you; will you support the nominee?"

Mr. Bryan responded:

"Would you support Roosevelt?"

Quick as a flash Colonel Holt said:

"Mr. Bryan, I consider that an insult and I apologize to the democrats of North Carolina for having cast my vote for you."

DEKALB THE CENTER

The Negro Population of the Country Turns on DeKalb County as its Hub

THE RACE NUMBERS 8,840,789

A Few Statistics Concerning Them. Death Rate and Illiteracy.—DeKalb County History.

The census bureau issued the final bulletin on the negro population of the United States, which shows a total of 8,840,789. The report indicates that between 11 and 16 per cent of the negro population has or is believed by the enumerators to have some degree of white blood.

The center of the negro population is in DeKalb county, Alabama, about four miles from the western boundary of Georgia, having moved thence from Dinwiddie county, Virginia, where 76 miles northeast, since 1790, more than 77 per cent of the negroes lived in the county against more than 57 per cent of the whites.

Almost 90 per cent of the negroes in the continental United States are in the southern states and three-tenths of them are in Georgia, Mississippi and Alabama.

Negroes constitute about one-fifteenth of the city population and about one-seventh of the country population of continental United States. There was an increase among the negroes of 1,345,318, or 18 per cent in continental United States, but the rate of increase declined steadily through the nineteenth century.

The negroes, unlike the Indians and the native white, have a slight excess of females. Illiteracy among them is about seven times greater than the whites. There are 3,992,387 negroes in the United States engaged in gainful occupations. Their death rate approximates 30 per cent while that of the whites under the same calculation is 18 per cent.

The county of DeKalb is one of the strong white counties of the state. It has a registered voting population of 4,500, which classes it about sixth in political strength. It is one of the older counties, having been carved out of the last Cherokee section from the district attached to St. Clair by an act dated January 9, 1836. It was named in honor of Major General DeKalb, of the colonial rebellion of 1776.

Baron DeKalb was a native of the German province of Alsace, which at that time belonged to France. He served with credit under Frederick the Great, by whom he was knighted, and afterwards entered the French army. He introduced the Marquis de la Fayette to the American commissioners, and resigned the position of brigadier general to accompany La-Fayette to the colonies in 1777. He was made a major general and served in New Jersey until ordered south in 1780. He was mortally wounded at the battle of Camden August 16, 1780.

The district in which the proportion of negroes is greatest lies in the Mississippi alluvial region along both banks of the lower Mississippi, where five-eighths of the population is negroes, the maximum in Lasquena county, Mississippi, being more than fifteen negroes to each white person. Negroes are a third of the population in the south, both in cities and in country districts, while in the north they are about one-fortieth in the city and a ninetieth of the population of country districts.

Half the negroes in the United States are below nineteen years of age, this medium age being four years below the whites.

Must Serve Sentence.

The supreme court has affirmed the decision of the lower court of Jefferson county in the case of Glenn Havis, who was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to twelve and one-half years. He was convicted of killing Elias Lathem in the Morris hotel April 17, 1903.

VANDALS

Continue Their Miserable Work at St. Louis.

An attempt has been made to wreck the great organ, the largest in the world, in festival hall at the world's fair, by cutting the secondary bellows. This will not affect the working of the organ, which can be operated with the primary bellows.

As a result of this attempt at vandalism, the company that is building the organ, which is only partly finished, will hereafter exclude from the stage all except those employed in the construction of the instrument.

Token to Cervera.

Despite the previous refusals of Admiral Cervera to allow Americans to make any demonstration of gratitude regarding his conduct at Santiago and his care for American soldiers imprisoned there, a project has taken shape to present him with an artistically engrossed message bearing the signatures of a number of notable persons, besides letters from the subscribers to the plan, bound in a volume.

NO AGREEMENT

And Work Has Stopped in Alabama Coal Mines.

A general suspension of work began Friday morning at the coal mines in Alabama employing United Mine Workers except about seventeen commercial coal operators' mines, and it is estimated that more than 7,500 miners are now idle awaiting the making of a new wage contract.

All of the coal mines of the furnace companies are now idle and a dosen or more commercial coal mines.

Mines in Walker county and those employing convict labor are not disturbed.

At the convention of the miners held in the morning the scale committee reported that no agreement had been made with the committee of the furnace operators on a scale and that the meetings of the joint committee would be continued on Tuesday next. The miners' convention then decided to leave the matter in the hands of the district executive board, the suspension of work to continue until such time as a wage scale was made.

ARRESTED. THE. SENATE.

General Ortas Broke Into the Treasury to Pay His Soldiers.

Advices from Cartegena, Colombia, confirm the recent news that Governor Escobar had all the members of the state assembly arrested. The assemblymen recently expressed themselves in strong language against the administration and the secretary of public instruction, has been repeatedly insulted.

A great deal of ammunition has disappeared from Cartegena and gatling guns and field pieces have been stolen. Rumors are current that another revolution may break out at any moment.

General Daniel Ortas recently surrounded the state treasury in Cartegena and broke open the safe to obtain money for the soldiers who had not been paid for a long time.

It is now generally admitted that General Reyes has been elected president of Colombia but there is no official confirmation.

CHANGED HANDS.

Anniston Plant of the Southern Car and Foundry Company Sold.

The entire Anniston plant of the Southern Car and Foundry Company is now the property of the Illinois Car and Equipment Company.

This information was given out by Joseph J. Willett, attorney for the Illinois Car and Equipment Company. The question which has been involved since the Southern Car and Foundry Company went into bankruptcy was the ownership of the new machinery installed by this company since its lease of the plant on June 1, 1903. The deal virtually places the property on the market. This is one of the largest and most complete car building plants in the south. Captain James M. Elliott made a deal for the property some time ago and the trade may now be consummated.

FREEDMEN'S. COLLEGE.

Work Will Begin in August. First Building Will Cost $25,000.

Ground will be broken on the first building of the college for negroes to be erected by the Freedmen's Aid and Southern Educational society in August. The first building to be begun will cost $25,000.

The institution will be located, it was decided by the executive board last year, at Mason, a small station on the Louisville & Nashville railroad. It was done in response to a donation of a plot of land by the Red Mountain Improvement company and about $5,000 in cash raised by the colored people of Birmingham and vicinity. The college will be made a parallel of that one which is thriving in Atlanta, and it is the intention of the society to spend as much money on it or probably $400,000.

Cars are now running between Florence, Tuscumbia and Sheffield. There was jollification there Friday over the consummation of the work. Representative Richardson spoke. Senator Morgan, who was to speak, was forbidden by his physician to leave Bailey Springs, where he is staying, and his speech was read by Captain R. T. Simpson.

COL. J. H. BRIGHAM,

Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, is Dead.

News has been received of the death at Delta, O., of Colonel Joseph H. Brigham, assistant secretary of agriculture.

Colonel Brigham was chairman of the government board at the St. Louis exposition.

For many years he had been prominent in Ohio politics, and has occupied his present position since the first administration of President McKinley.

State Schools.

The annual meeting of the board of trustees of the Alabama School for the Deaf, the Alabama School for the Blind and the school for the negro deaf and blind was held at Talladega. Principal Johnson submitted his annual report of the operation of the three schools during the past scholastic year. The attendance has been exceptionally good and the work accomplished was very satisfactory.

The review of southern industrial progress for the second quarter of the present year shows a total of 1,534 new industries established in the southern states during that period. VOL II. CLANTON, ALA., JULY 14, 1904. NO. 16.

THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM

The full platform as unanimously submitted by the committee on platform and resolutions and immediately adopted by the national democratic convention is as follows:

The democratic party of the United States, in national convention assembled, declares its devotion to the cardinal principles of democracy which brings its members together in party communion.

Under them local self-government and national unity of prosperity were alike established.

They underlaid our independence, the structure of our free republic and every democratic extension from Louisiana to California and Texas to Oregon, which is reserved faithfully in all the states the tie between taxation and representation. They yet inspire the masses of our people, guarding jealously their rights and liberties and cherishing their fraternity, peace and orderly development. They remind us of our duties and responsibilities as citizens and impress upon us, particularly at this time, the necessity of reform and the rescue of the administration of government from the headstrong, arbitrary and spasmodic methods which distract business by uncertainty and pervade the public mind with dread, distrust and perturbation.

1. The application of these fundamental principles to the living issues of the day is the first step toward the assured peace, safety and progress of our nation. Freedom of the press, of conscience and of speech—equality before the law of all citizens, right of trial by jury, freedom of the person defended by the merit of habeas corpus, liberty of personal contract, untrammeled by sumptuary laws, supremacy of the civil over military authority, a well-defined militia, the separation of church and state, economy in expenditures, low taxes that labor may be lightly burdened, prompt and sacred fulfillment of public and private obligations, fidelity to treaties, peace and friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none, absolute acquiescence in the will of the majority, the vital principle of republics—these are doctrines which democracy has established, approved by the nation and they should be constantly invoked and enforced.

We favor the enactment and administration of laws giving labor and capital impartially their just rights. Capital and labor ought not to be enemies. Each is necessary to the other. Each has its rights, but the rights of labor are certainly no less "vested," no less "sacred" and no less "inalienable" than the rights of capital.

Constitutional guarantees are violated whenever any citizen is denied the right to labor, acquire and enjoy property or reside where interest or inclination may determine. Any denial thereof, by individuals, organizations or governments should be summarily rebuked or punished.

We deny the right of any executive to disregard or suspend any constitutional privilege or limitation. Obedience to the laws and respect for their requirements are alike the supreme duty of the citizen and the official.

The military should be used only to support and maintain the law. We unqualifiedly condemn its employment for the summary banishment of citizens without trial or for the control of elections.

We approve the measure which passed the United States senate in 1896, but which a republican congress has ever since refused to enact, relating to contempts in federal courts and providing for trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt.

We favor liberal appropriations for the care and improvement of the waterways of the country. When any water like the Mississippi river is of sufficient size to demand special aid from the government, such aid should be extended with a definite aim of continuous work until permanent improvement is secured. We oppose the republican policy of starving home development in order to feed the greed for conquest and the appetite for national "prestige" and display of strength.

Large reductions can easily be made in the annual expenditures of the government without impairing the efficiency of any branch of the public service, and we shall insist upon the strictest economy and frugality compatible with vigorous and efficient naval, military and naval administration as a right of the people, too clear to be denied or withheld.

2. We favor the enforcement of honesty in the public service and to that end a thorough legislative investigation of the executive departments of the government already known to be with corruption, and the punishment of ascertained corruptionists without fear or favor, or regard to persons. The persistent and deliberate refusal of both the senate and the house of representatives to permit such investigation to be made, demonstrates that only by a change in the executive and in the legislative departments can complete exposure, punishment and correction be obtained.

Federal Government Contract With

We condemn the action of the republican party in congress in refusing to prohibit an executive department from entering into contracts with convicted trusts or unlawful combinations in restraint of interstate trade. We believe that one of the best methods of procuring honesty in the public service is to have public officials from the white house down to the lowest of them returned as nearly as may be to Jeffersonian simplicity of living.

We favor the nomination and election of a president imbued with the principles of the constitution who will set his face sternly against executive usurpation if the usurpation be veiled under the guise of executive construction of existing laws or whether it take refuge in the tyrant's plea of necessity of superior wisdom.

We favor the preservation in so far as we can of an open door of the world's commerce in the Orient without unnecessary entanglement in Oriental and European affairs, and without arbitrary, unlimited, irresponsible government anywhere in our jurisdiction. We oppose as fervently as did George Washington himself indefinite, irresponsible, discretionary and vague absolutism, and a policy of colonial exploitation, no matter where or by whom invoked or exercised. We believe with Thomas Jefferson and John Adams that no government has a right to make one set of laws for those "at home" and another and a different set of laws, absolute in their character, for those "in the colonies." All men under the American flag are entitled to the protection of the institutions whose emblem the flag is; if they are inherently unfit for those institutions, then they are inherently unfit to be members of the American body politic. Wherever there may exist a people incapable of being governed under American laws in consonance with the American constitution, the territory of that people ought not to be a part of the American domain.

We insist that we ought to do for the Filipinos what we have done already for the Cubans. And it is our duty to make that promise now and upon suitable guarantees of protection to citizens of our own and other countries resident there at the time of our withdraw, set the Filipino people upon their feet, free and independent to work out their own destiny.

The endeavor of the secretary of war by pledging the government's indorsement for "promoters" in the Philippine islands to make the United States a partner in speculative exploitation of the archipelago, which was only temporarily held up by the opposition of democratic senators in the last session, will, if successful, lead to embarrassments from which it will be difficult to escape.

The democratic party has been and will continue to be the consistent opponent of that class of tariff legislation by which certain interests have been permitted through congressional favor to draw a heavy tribute from the American people. This monstrous perversion of those equal opportunities which our political institutions were established to secure has caused what may once have been infant industries to become the greatest combinations of capital that the world has ever known. These especial favorites of the government have, through trust methods, been converted into monopolies, thus bringing to an end domestic competition which was the only alleged check upon the extravagant system. These industrial combinations, by the financial assistance they can give, now control the policy of the republican party.

We denounce protection as a robbery of the many and enrichment of the few and we favor a tariff limited to the needs of the government economically administered and so levied as not to discriminate against any industry, class or section to the end that the burdens of taxation shall be distributed as equally as possible.

We favor a revision and gradual reduction of the tariff by the friends of the masses, and for the common weal and not by the friends of its abuses, its extortions and its discriminations, keeping in view the ultimate ends of "equality of burdens and equality of opportunities, and the constitutional purpose of raising a revenue by taxation, to-wit: the support of the federal government in all its integrity and virility; but in simplicity."

We recognize that the gigantic trusts and combinations designed to enable capital to secure more than its just share of the joint products of capital and labor, and which have been fostered and promoted under republican rule are a menace to the beneficial competition, and an obstacle to permanent business prosperity.

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable.

Individual equality of opportunity and free competition are essential to a healthy and permanent commercial prosperity and any trust, combination or monopoly tending to destroy these by controlling production, restricting competition or fixing prices should be prohibited and punished by law.

We especially denounce rebates and discrimination by transportation companies as the most potent agency in promoting and strengthening these unlawful conspiracies against trade.

We demand an enlargement of the powers of the interstate commerce commission to the end that the traveling men and shippers of this country may have prompt and adequate relief for the abuses to which they are subjected in the matter of transportation. We demand a strict enforcement of existing civil and criminal statutes against all such trusts, combinations and monopolies, and we demand the enactment of such further legislation as may be necessary to effectually suppress them.

Any trust or unlawful combination engaged in interstate commerce which is monopolizing any branch of business or reduction should not be permitted to transact business outside of the state of its origin. Whenever it shall be established in any court of competent jurisdiction that such monopolization exists, such prohibition should be enforced through comprehensive laws to be enacted on the subject.

We congratulate our western citizens upon the passage of the law known as the Newlands irrigation act for the irrigation and reclamation of the arid lands of the west—a measure framed by a democrat, passed in the senate by a non-partisan vote and passed in the house against the opposition of almost all the republican leaders by a vote the majority of which was democratic. We call attention to this great democratic measure, broad and comprehensive as it is, working automatically throughout all time without further action of congress until the reclamation of all the lands in the arid west capable of reclamation is accomplished, reserving the lands reclaimed for home seekers in small tracts, and rigidly guarding against land monopoly as an evidence of the policy of domestic developments contemplated by the democratic party should it be placed in power.

The democracy when entrusted with power will construct the Panama canal speedily, honestly and economically, thereby giving to our people what democrats have always contended for—a great oceanic canal furnishing shorter and cheaper lines of transportation and less trammeled trade relations with the other peoples of the world.

We pledge ourselves to insist upon the just and lawful protection of our citizens at home and abroad, and to use all proper measures to secure for them, whether native-born or naturalized, and without distinction of race or creed, the equal protection of laws and the enjoyment of all rights and privileges open to them under the covenants of our treaties of friendship and commerce; and if under existing treaties the right to travel and sojourn is denied to American citizens or recognition is withheld from American passports by any countries on the ground of race or creed, we favor the beginning of negotiations with the governments of such countries to secure by new treaties the removal of these unjust discriminations.

We demand that all over the world a duly authenticated passport issued by the government of the United States to an American citizen shall be proof of the fact that he is an American citizen and shall entitle him to the treatment due him as such.

We favor the election of United States senators by the direct vote of the people.

We favor the admission of the territories of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory. We also favor the immediate admission of Arizona and New Mexico as separate states and a territorial government for Alaska and Porto Rico.

We hold that the officials appointed to administer the government of any territory as well as with the district of Alaska should be bona fide residents at the time of their appointment of the territory or district in which their duties are to be performed.

We demand the extermination of polygamy within the jurisdiction of the United States, and the complete separation of church and state in political affairs.

We denounce the ship subsidy bill recently passed by the United States senate as an iniquitous appropriation of public money for private purposes and a wasteful, illogical and useless attempt to overcome by subsidy the obstructions raised by republican legislation to the growth and development of American commerce on the sea.

We favor the upbuilding of American merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the public treasury.

We favor liberal trade arrangements with Canada and with people of other countries where they can be entered into with benefit to American agriculture, manufactures, mining and commerce.

We favor the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine in its full integrity.

We favor the reduction of the army and army expenditures to the point historically demonstrated to be safe and sufficient.

The democracy would secure to the surviving soldiers and sailors and their dependents generous pensions, not by an arbitrary executive order, but by legislation which a grateful people stand ready to enact.

Our soldiers and sailors who defend with their lives the constitution and the laws have a sacred interest in their just administration. They must therefore, share with us the humiliation with which we have witnessed the exaltation of court favorites without distinguished service over the scarred heroes of many battles, or aggrandized by executive appropriations out of the treasuries of a prostrate people in violation of the act of congress which fixes the compensation and allowances of the military officers.

The democratic party stands committed to the principles of civil service reform and we demand their honest, just and impartial enforcement.

We denounce the republican party for its continuous and sinister encroachment upon the spirit and operation of civil service rules whereby it has arbitrarily dispensed with examinations for office in the interests of favorites and employed all manner of devices to overreach and set aside the principles upon which the civil service was established.

The race question has brought countless woes to this country. The calm wisdom of the American people should see to it that it brings no more.

To revive the dead and hateful race and sectional animosities in our common country means confusion, distraction of business and the reopening of wounds now happily healed. North, south, east and west have but recently stood together in line of battle from the walls of Pekin and the hills of Santiago as sharers of a common glory and a common destiny; we share fraternally the common burdens. We, therefore, deprecate and condemn the Bourbon-like selfish and narrow spirit of the recent republican convention at Chicago which sought to kindle anew the embers of racial and sectional strife and we appeal from it to the sober common sense and patriotic spirit of the American people.

The existing republican administration has been spasmodic, erratic, sensational, spectacular and arbitrary. It has made itself a satire upon the congress, the courts and upon the settled practices and usages of national and international law.

It summoned the congress into hasty and futile extra session and virtually adjourned it, leaving behind in its flight from Washington full calendars an unaccomplished tasks.

It made war which is the sole power of congress without its authority thereby usurping one of its fundamental prerogatives. It violated a plain statute of the United States as well as plain treaty obligations, international usages and constitutional laws; and has done so under pretense of executing a great public policy which could have been more easily affected lawfully, constitutionally and with honor. It forced strained and unnatural constructions upon statutes, usurping judicial interpretation and substituting congressional enactment decree.

It withdrew from congress their customary duties of investigation which have heretofore made the representatives of the people of the states the terror of evil doers.

It conducted a secretive investigation of its own and boasted of a few sample convicts while it threw a broad coverlet over the burdens which had been their chosen field of operative abuses, and kept in power the superior officers under whose administration the crimes had been committed.

It ordered assault upon some monopolies, but paralyzed by its first victory, it flung out the flag of truce and cried out that it would not "run amuck"—leaving its future purposes beclouded by its vacillations.

Conducting the campaign upon this declaration of our principles and purposes, we invoke for our candidates the support not only of our great and time-honored organization, but also the active assistance of all our fellow citizens who disregarding past differences upon questions, no longer in issue, desire the perpetuation of our constitutional government as framed and established by the fathers of the republic.

Aberdeen, Miss., is preparing to erect new waterworks, bonds having recently been issued for that purpose.

CROP PROGRESS.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Climate and Crop Bulletin of the Weather Bureau—Alabama Section—For Week Ending July 11th, 1904.

General Conditions.

The week, as a whole, was favorable for crop growth; temperatures averaged nearly normal, with very general and beneficial rains; in some places too much rain was received, but in a few scattered localities more is needed; high winds were slightly damaging in a few localities. Cotton is making generally good growth and continues to fruit well; there are a few reports of lice, rust and blight, and some fields are getting grassy though the crop, as a whole, is now promising, with much of it laid by. Corn, both early and late, is generally promising, though in some places early corn is a failure from effects of previous drouth. Gardens and all minor crops are doing well, except where rain is needed; melons are being marketed in good condition; field peas, sorghum and cane are generally quite promising; pastures have improved and the second cutting of hay promises a good yield; wheat is being thrashed slowly, with a good yield; a large peach crop is being marketed, though wet weather has caused peaches and grapes to rot in some sections. A period of dry weather would now be beneficial in nearly all districts.

FRANK P. CHAFFEE,
Section Director Weather Bureau.
Montgomery, Ala.

COTTON CROP IS GOOD.

Boll Weevils Increasing in Texas, but Elsewhere Growth is Good.

The weather bureau's weekly summary of crop conditions says:

Over the greater part of the corn belt corn has made vigorous growth, but continuous rains have prevented cultivation and much of the crop is weedy.

Winter wheat has sustained great damage from continuous heavy rains. Harvesting was also greatly hindered by unfavorable weather east of the Mississippi river

Cotton has grown rapidly throughout the cotton belt, complaints of too rapid growth being received from portions of the central districts where the crop is suffering for cultivation. In portions of the western districts cotton is also in need of cultivation and some shedding is reported from portions of Texas and South Carolina. Over the greater part of Texas, however, and in the eastern district the crop is in a good state of cultivation and comparatively little damage from insects is reported, except in Texas, where boll weevils are increasing and becoming more destructive in the southwestern counties.

The weather conditions have been highly favorable for tobacco, which is in a thrifty condition in all of the important tobacco states.

Fatally Shot.

News has just been received of a killing which occurred near Winham Springs. Will Bagswell and John Lollar, two young white men, quarreled while going from church, when Lollar knocked Bagswell down twice in succession. When the latter rose he drew from his pocket a revolver, shooting Lollar through the head. Both young men are well known and come of prominent families.

Bishop Charles R. Galloway and wife, of Mississippi, leave for Japan and other countries in the far east, to be absent several months, during which time the bishop will visit all Methodist headquarters in that part of the world as the official representative of the home church. This is Bishop Galloway's third visit to the orient.

Fourteen Murders Chaged to Him.

Pearl Skelton, at Cripple Creek, is charged with the murder of the fourteen men killed by the explosion at Independence station June 6th. Skelton was a member of the new free coinage miners' union and had worked in several mines in the district.

City Marshal Kills Man.

A special from Ruleville, Miss., says that City Marshal John Smith shot and killed Edward K. St. Clair. It is claimed the killing was in self-defense. St. Clair is said to have been drinking.

BEAUTY IN THE HEART

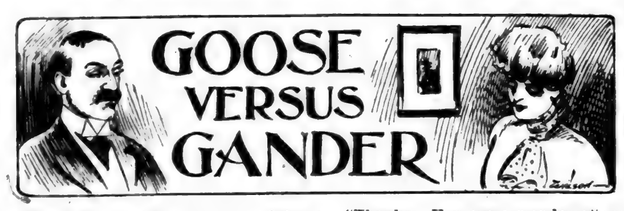
Some like the girl with the beautiful face,
Others like the girl with an easy grace;
But I like the girl with the charming ways,
Whose beauty shows in her virtuous gaze.

Some like the girl who is tall and stout,
Others like the girl who is always out;
But I like the girl with the innocent mind,
Whose virtues shows to all mankind.

Some like the girl with the lily-white skin,
Others like the girl who is easy to win;
But I like the girl with the spotless name,
Whose beautiful nature leads to fame.

Some like the girl who is stout and strong,
Others like the girl who is neat and long;
But I like the girl with the smiling face,
Whose character shows in her moral grace.

Some like the girl who is fond of wine,
Others like the girl with whom they dine.
But I like the girl who refuses them all,
Who, trusting in God, shall never fall.
—A. D. McEvoy.



That Mrs. Spelthorne was a determined young woman everybody knew, and her husband knew it best of all, as it was quite right he should. Yet, because he loved her, he was always ready to make excuses for her to those who had any right to listen to them.

"You see," he would say, "she was an only child and motherless, and ran wild about her father's place while he was at his business all day. Then, later, she was constituted the mistress of his house, and ruled it with great firmness. She was also considered pretty by many people—I consider her so myself, although I am her husband—and she had other offers before mine."

"Dear, dear, the listener said.

"Quite so, that has always been my view of it. There was one—it's truly dreadful to narrate—who was a clerk to a brewer in the neighborhood; then there was a doctor's assistant"——

"Good heavens!"

"Then there was a curate"——

"This is awful!"

"And a host of others. But, all the same, she was reserved for me, and I have got her; and if she is wilful, she is winsome, and I love her. Oh! I do."

Now, Mrs. Spelthorne and her husband really did dwell in a very pleasant state of connubial amity—in spite of the revelations Mr. Spelthorne had just seen fit to make to his cousin (first) home from India—owing partly to the fact that they suited each other, and also did not interfere with each other's habits and customs, while, as becomes a modern model couple, each went their own way without bothering the other. Spelthorne, of course, had a club or so—what self-respecting husband hasn't?—and a club covereth a multitude of things. So, also, had Mrs. Spelthorne — the "Advanced Women's" it was called—and here it was her habit to regale some of her friends whom, as she used to say, "Charlie did not like, because he was so funny."

All the same, the Spelthorne menage ran well and smoothly. Charlie went to the city and played at being a stock broker, and Jessie sat in her flat telling the cook of her past life and experiences, and talking about her father's place in Sussex, till it was time to go to the "Advanced Women's." But, one night, when Charlie came home to dinner, which he did regularly—sometimes—his wife said, "Lady D'Hautenbas wants me to go down to her little place at Molesey to-morrow to help her to choose the new wall paper. We shall be quite alone, and just dine there, sleep there, and come back early next morning. So she is not asking you"——

"Shouldn't go if she did," Charlie

"Oh, by the bye, give me some money, will you?"

said. "Very busy myself. Great Taraxacum Gold Mines being floated. Late night in city. Go and enjoy yourself. God bless you!"

"Dear old Charlie. Oh! by the by, give me some money, will you?"

"I can't. Check book is in the city."

"I know. But I tore two or three out the other day, so as to always have them in the flat if wanted. I'll just go and fill one up while you are smoking your after dinner cigarette, and you can sign it. It won't be a minute."

"Thanks. You are a wonder at saving me trouble, Jessie."

"I always was. Father used to say just the same thing. Ten pounds will do for the present. Back in a moment."

Twenty-four hours later than this not uncommon domestic episode took place, viz., at 9 o'clock at night, Charlie Spelthorne stood in the bedroom of the flat (the dressing room was sacred to his wife) and cast a fearful eye around it while taking the precaution immediately afterward of turning the key.

Then he opened a huge kit bag

Rushed at the burning lady.

and drew out a polichinelle costume, white shoes, stockings and all, and commenced to array his comely form in them. Then he powdered his face, went to his wife's dressing room, and, obtaining some weird ungent, daubed two round spots on his cheeks, and next drew over his own fair curly hair the clown's wig.

"What a good job it was," he muttered, as he went through the mysteries of this toilet, "that Jessie went out of town with Lady D'Hautenbas to-day. Otherwise Algy and I—or I, at least—could never have gone to the 'Chorus Girls' ball.' They say half London, of sorts, will be there. We ought to have a ripping old time. I hope Jessie won't ever hear of it, though."

Half an hour later his four-wheeler drew up at some chambers in Bury street, and a tall gentleman, also enveloped in a long coat, but disguised underneath as Henri IV. (he didn't look a bit like him), got into it, and away they went to a well-known tavern in the neighborhood of Cavendish square, where a vast ballroom can be hired for similar and other functions.

There was a sound of revelry by night! And bright the lamps shone o'er fair women and brave men (Byron copyright has expired by "efflux of time"—for this phrase vide the legal reporters). Likewise the soothing sound of the popping of festive champagne corks was to be heard, cigarette smoke perfumed the air, so did Patchouli and Opoponax and other things. "On went the dance and joy was unconfined." The floors shook beneath the concussion of hundreds of feet, and suddenly, in the middle of it all, Charlie reeled heavily against his friend Algy Smith, and exclaimed, "I've had a vision."

"Better have a drink, old man. What's the vision, all the same?"

"You know this Lady D'Hautenbas by sight—I don't. Tell me, I implore, does she squint?"

"Like a fiend. Well!"

"Look at that woman in the black mask, close by. Weighs about sixteen stone, dressed as Juliet. Oh! do look, Algy."

"I am looking. It's about the bulk. She's a fine figure of a woman. But the eyes, especially the left one, don't look just like hers."

"The wall paper! The wall paper!" Charlie moaned. "The writing on the wall—I mean the wall paper!"

"This won't do, old boy," Algy exclaimed. "What did you have to drink at dinner?" But before he could receive an answer to this dietary question an awful thing occurred.

The chandelier—probably jumped out of its fastening by the herculean efforts of the dancers—fell to the floor with a crash, and in doing so ignited the dresses of some of the dancers, especially those of the ladies. And one of these latter, dressed as La Pompadour, appeared now to be in pretty bad case, since she seemed well alight in a moment.

But Charlie was always a hero, and he proved himself one at this time. While other men nervously stood still he snatched the cloak off his Henri IV. friend's shoulders, rushed at the burning lady, threw her down on the floor, fell alongside of her, extinguished the flames, and, amid a roar of applause from the company, got her, unharmed and untouched by the flames, to her feet.

But as she staggered up her mask fell off, and Charlie also staggered back, gasping and mumbling.

"You traitress!" he said. "You—you—choosing the wall paper, indeed! I knew it."

"You wretch! What about your old Podophyllin—I mean Taraxacum—Gold Mines. I'll have a divorce."

But all the same she didn't, because, you see, this was a case of "sauce for the goose,' or "tit for tat," or "Ruse contre Ruse," or whatever it pleases you to call it.—The King.

THREE TYPES OF RUSSIANS.

They Are the Great, the Little and the White.

There are three grand divisions of the nationality—the great Russians, the little Russians and the white Russians center at Moscow, the little Russians. The great Russians center at Moscow, the little Russians at Kieff. The blood of the white Russians is pure, but their civilization is less advanced than that of the other two. The great Russians, many times the most numerous, are the vigorous and pushing element of the Russian nation. Though the least Slavic, it has been the great colonizer of the Slavic race. Its whole history has been of one long struggle against Asia.

The great Russian's stature is oftener high than low; his skin is white his eyes often blue, his hair mostly blonde. The little Russian is handsomer, taller, livelier, more alert in mind, but more changeable, meditative, indolent. He has more independence, more individuality and is more dreamy and poetical.

The white Russian is so called because he is fond of wearing white clothes, yet he is not as clean as the other two divisions of his countrymen. In old times he was also called "white" because of his freedom from taxation.

TOO MUCH FOR MADDOX.

Southerner Yielded to Pleading of Representative Payne.

It deeply grieved Sereno E. Payne, the Republican floor leader, when Mr. Maddox of Georgia raised the point of no quorum and thus threatened to prevent the house from passing a lot of bills. With a heavy sigh Mr. Payne arose, steered his portly form across to the Democratic side, and looked down on Mr. Maddox with a pained look.

"Maddox," said Payne in a seductive tone, "why do you ball things up this way just as we are getting along so nicely? You have some secret reason, Maddox. Tell me what it is?"

"Mr. Payne," began Maddox with dignity.

"Confidentially," said Mr. Payne in a wheedling voice. "I won't breathe it to a soul."

"As I was about to say, Mr. Payne" resumed Mr. Maddox.

"Just among us girls," pleaded Mr. Payne.

The grizzled, lean, bald-headed old Confederate looked up at the large form and white head above him, and gasped a couple of times. Then he arose.

"Mr. Speaker," said Mr. Maddox, "I withdraw the point."

Song of the Office Seeker.

My voice is as hoarse as a fog horn; my hand has been squeezed to a pulp;
I've forced down so many Scotch highballs that I am too crowded to gulp.
My eyes in their sockets are burning; my hair needs a comb and a brush.
My feet are as wet as a dishrag from tramping around in the slush.
But still I am warbling my matin—it acts as a wonderful salve.
"Say, what are you going to have, boys? What are you going to have?

My throat is inflamed from much smoking and telling how honest I am;
My temper and patience I'm losing, but still I am meek as a lamb.
My rival is out with his hammer, reciting the breaks I have made—
The fondness I have for red liquor, the bills that I never have paid.
But hark to the song I am singing; in sooth, 'tis a fine brand of salve;
"Say, what are you going to have, boys? What are you going to have?"

Whence Came "Humbug"?

The word "humbug" has been traced back to the title-page of "The Universal Jester, being a collection of merry conceits, bon-mots and humbugs, by Ferdinando Killigrew, London, 1735-40."

The following are the most plausible and possible derivations:

In the time of James II a worthless coin was minted at Dubin from a soft, mixed metal, which became known as Uim bog, pronounced Oombug, i. e., soft copper, worthless money.

Others refer it to hum, in the sense of hoax, and bug, in the old sense of bugbear.

Others say it is merely hum buzz used in combination to signify sound without sense. Others, again, think that it was first applied to Homberg, a chemist and an ardent seeker of the Philosopher's stone.—Stray Stories.

WHISTLER PAINTED THE SIGN,

And the Miller Was There, Though Not Visible.

Gov. Murphy of New Jersey told recently at the Annapolis Naval Academy an interesting story about the painter Whistler.

"While Whistler was at West Point," he said, "he turned an honest penny now and then by painting portraits, and even by painting signs.

"There was one day a facetious miller, who asked the young man to make a picture of his mill that he might hang, by way of a sign, over the door.

"'Paint the mill,' said the miller, 'just as it is, and paint me at the window, looking out. But I must not be idle in the picture, and so, when anyone looks at me I must pop in my head.'

"Here the miller laughed heartily.

"'Can you paint a picture like that?' he asked.

"'To be sure,' Whistler answered quietly.

"And he painted the mill, leaving out the miller altogether, and then he submitted the picture for approval.

"The miller looked at it carefully, then he nodded and smiled.

"'This is good,' he said, 'but how about me? Where is the miller?'

"'He was at the window,' Whistler answered, 'but when you looked at him he popped in his head.'"

WAR SPIRIT OF THE JAPS.

Their Fanatical Bravery a Thing to Wonder At.

Lieut. Masaki of a Japanese warship writes to his wife: "After all there is plenty of luck in battle and a fellow of good luck cannot die if he wish to. For instance, a shot or ball cannot hit a lucky dog like me. On the occasion of the fight of Feb. 9 the only things I had in my bosom were the charm you sent me and a photograph of Iko (the lieutenant's eldest son). During the fight I took my post on a barbette and directed the fire of the broadsides; but when the range had increased I ordered to cease firing. Then I took out Iko's photograph and turned it face toward the scene of the battle, addressing it as if it were Iko in person. 'If as a result of this war,' I said to it, 'the situation of the far east is firmly fixed and no war should occur during your lifetime, then you might think yourself born in vain as an officer's son. Therefore you should carefully observe this scene even from your photograph, so that the sight may inspire in you the proud warrior spirit worthy of a man. If, however, fortune favors you with a chance of being under fire, as I am now, then there is all the more reason to observe the scene carefully for your future benefit.'"

Fate's Answer.

"What is the time?"
A little child asked on a fair June day.
"'Tis time to play," said Fate;
And romping merrily it went on its way.

"What is the time?"
A boy asks, half in earnest, half in jest.
"'Tis time to think," said Fate,
"To weld the chain of knowledge link by link."

"What is the time?"
The boy to manhood grown now eager asks.
"'Tis time to love and wed," said Fate.
"To give the heart precedence to the head."

"What is the time?"
A father with grave face is asking now.
"'Tis time to strive," said Fate,
"To toil for others and for others thrive."

"What is the time?"
At last an old man, bent with years and care, the question puts.
"'Tis time to die," said Fate,
"And in the earth which nourished thee to lie."
And this was the last question and reply.

The last 'mid earthly scenes;
Yet who shall say
That in some gentler clime—
Unknown and here unknowable—
More answers will not follow those of Fate,
'Mid all the glories of an endless day.
Answers indeed, but not like those of time—
Blunt, brief, and harsh of sound;
But filled with love that hath no mete nor bound.

Explosion of Shells.

The experience of the Japanese in the failure of their shells to explode is similar to that of the British. Lyddite, the high explosive used by the British during the Boer war, was simply picric acid melted and cast into the projectiles. While cast picric acid is sufficiently sensitive to enable shells filled with it to be fired from guns with safety, it can only be fired through moderately thin plate without exploding from the shock.

Not Always Tempered.

William Norris, actor, was discussing the hard luck of an acquaintance with a fellow-member of the Lambs.

"You know the old saying," remarked the friend, "that God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb."

"Sometimes He toughens the lamb," replied Mr. Norris. "Vide these lamb chops I am having for breakfast this morning."—New York Times.

Colorado Wool Output.

The wool season closed in Montrose county, Colorado, with the record of over 300,000 pounds of wool shipped out, the largest output in the history of the county. About 50,000 head of sheep were maintained on the range, in this one county, last season.

At least 90 per cent of the migrating birds crossed the English channel during the night. This point was noted by the observer at the Eddystone lighthouse. Where large tracts of water are crossed the birds are night travelers.

He Needs No Sleep

"How is it that some persons want much sleep, some can do on little, while there are still others who can get along without any sleep at all?" asked a writer in the New Orleans Times-Democrat. "Now here is a problem, a solution of which might prove a vast benefit to humankind. I am reminded of the importance of the subject by a case to which my attention was recently called in New Jersey. Albert Herpin of Trenton, born in France, a hostler, declares that he has not slept a wink for ten years, and his statement, according to the New York Herald's correspondent, is borne out by the physicians who have at different times treated him for insomnia.

"Of his case Herpin says: 'I have been to hospitals, where they attempted to drug me in order to produce sleep, but I would not undergo that sort of treatment. I have given up the idea of sleeping for the rest of my life; in fact, I'm so used to it that I think no more about the matter. I've heard of people going insane that were troubled with insomnia, but I never will. I am well and eat three meals a day.'

"It would seem from this that sleep is not one of life's essentials. Is sleep absolutely necessary to healthful existence? Centers of the Brain

Biologists admit that psychic centers are localized in the cortex of the brain. The function of language, for example, is perverted or suppressed when a certain portion of the frontal lobes of the brain is altered or destroyed. Dr. Grasset, in a recent work on "Spiritism," holds that the centers of automatism and sub-consciousness form together a kind of polygonal area. In the Revue de Philosophie he also discusses the question of an immaterial soul and its relation to these phychic centers of the brain, and he concludes that the two conceptions are not incompatible. Intelligence, he argues, is a faculty of the soul. One cannot localize it in an organ. The psychic function, however, is more complex. It comprises the immaterial intelligence and the thought expressed, associated as we observe it in human life. For this psychic function a material organ or instrument as well as the immaterial intelligence is required, and this organ is the cortex of the brain. Whether the psychic center of the cortex only serves to clothe the idea, to express the thought, or intervenes otherwise, what does it matter to the ... so long as he can localize the... The Horses of Mexico

Although at the time of the conquest horses were unknown in Mexico, that country to-day boasts of some of the finest of the species. The horses of Cuba that were taken to Mexico as well as the horses that went to the River Plate on a similar errand of conquest are believed to have been of Andalusian breed, and Cunninghame Graham, the famous British author and traveler, who knows from personal experience both Mexican and Argentine horses, holds that we must look to Barbary for the progenitors of the Cordobese horses. "Most horses," he says, "in fact, all breeds of horses, have six lumbar vertebrae. A most careful observer, the late Edward Losson, a professor in the Agricultural college of Santa Catalina, near Buenos Ayres, has noted the remarkable fact that the horses of the Pampas have only five. Following up his researches, he has found that the only other breed of horses in which a similar peculiarity is to be found is that of Barbary."

Cupid Ever at Work

Long ago the silly odium that attached to old-maidenship disappeared, but even in the days when popular notion made a spinster of 40 a hopeless old maid, records show that there was no age limit to matrimonial hopes.

For instance, so long ago as 1774, Miss Jane Hodgeson of Stepney, England, was wedded to Henry Hulton, of the same place, when she had reached her 92d summer, and the bridegroom was two years older, says the Philadelphia Inquirer.

More remarkable was the wedding of John Jackson and Annie Bates, on March 22, 1796, the 101st birthday of the bridegroom, who was three years older than the bride. It was his fourth marriage within two years, and 10,000 persons escorted the couple to the church.

A youth of 19, a son of Mr. Graves, of Balcock-on-Herts, married "Mistress Lake, spinster, aged 70." April 20, 1731, and in August of the same year, at Bath, Capt. Hamilton, aged 30, married Miss Manson, a blushing bride of rank, fortune, and 85 years.

Chairman Williams sharply reprimanded the persistence of the demand, saying the report would be read if the delegates would allow it by keeping quiet.

Arguing for the adoption of the report, Mr. Grady said the national committee had decided to include Porto Rico in the call of the convention.

The committee had to consider the question, he said, as to whether these delegates had the right to vote. The supreme court of the United States had decided that Porto Rico was a part of the territory of the United States. The same court had decided that the Philippines was not a part of the United States. The committee had followed the court and given Porto Rico votes and withheld votes from the Philippines.

The report was adopted.

The secretary announced that the permanent organization committee was not ready to make a report and desired a conference of the committee at once.

"The next thing in the order of business," said the chairman, "is the report of the committee on credentials."

The clerk made a second announcement on the call for the credentials committee's report. That committee had just announced that it would not be prepared to report till 2 o'clock.

The chair then recognized W. G. Sheedy, of New York, who moved that a recess be taken till 2 o'clock. The convention was instantly in an uproar of confusion as the delegates and visitors arose to leave.

The motion to take a recess was agreed to by a viva voca vote and the morning session came to a close at 12:04.

The sub-committee of the committee on resolutions continued its work on the platform. Mr. Bryan and two other members were absent but the committee decided to proceed in their absence with the consideration of questions in which they were not especially concerned.

Accordingly the irrigation plank presented by Mr. Newlands was taken up and tentatively accepted.

Consideration of the proposed statehood declarations was then entered upon. A plank for separate statehood for each of the territories was inserted.

During the forenoon Ex-Senator Towne was admitted to the committee room to present a petition signed by 10,000 persons requesting the insertion of a plank calling for the independence of the Philippines when prepared for self government.

The committee agreed upon a plank declaring for the election of senators by direct vote of the people.

Telegrams have been sent by democratic officials of Utah to D. B. Hill, W. J. Bryan and other prominent democratic leaders, and to members of the delegates from other states strongly opposing the insertion of an anti-polygamy plank on the democratic national convention, and urging them to vote down the plank on this subject, which, it is understood, is being urged by Senator Dubois, of Idaho. The telegrams to former Senator Hill were especially emphatic. A telegram was received from National Committeeman Perry today stating that compromise plan had been agreed upon which will not be offensive to Utah Mormons.

The committee on permanent organization of the national democratic convention accepted the formal declination of Senator Bailey as permanent chairman. Champ Clark, of Missouri, was elected and has accepted.

The demonstration made by the national democratic convention at the mention of the name of Grover Cleveland by John Sharp Williams was the absorbing topic of conversation in the hotel corridors last night and this morning, and while the boom for Mr. Cleveland was not revived by the outburst of enthusiasm it was conclusive of the high regard in which he is held by a goodly portion of the convention.

The vice presidential nomination is receiving scant attention.

It is agreed generally that there will be two reports submitted by the subcommittee appointed to draft a platform and that two reports likewise will be submitted by the full committee to the convention. The fight on the floor of the convention, it is expected, will be led by the old time rivals, David B. Hill and William Jennings Bryan, recalling the celebrated contest in the 1896 convention.

Victory, however, will this time shift standards and Hill will have the satisfaction of redeeming his defeat of eight years ago. Even the conservatives are divided over some planks of the platform, so that the committee on platform may not be able to report before Friday.

It is the consensus of opinion that Temporary Chairman Williams' speech was a masterly effort.

With one exception—the contest in the twenty-first Illinois district—the credentials committee of the national democratic convention followed the lead of the national committee and seated the delegates recommended as the temporary roll of the convention.

The feature of the session was the declaration of W. J. Bryan, who paid the committee a call at 3 a. m. that he should make the Illinois contest an issue on the floor of the convention.

With the promise of a contest of giant orators over the adoption of the report of the committee on credentials, the hall filled early for the afternoon session of the convention.

As he was going into the hall Champ Clark said: "I have received a cordial telegram from Senator Cockrell saying he would be glad for me to act as permanent chairman. If we don't get blocked, I see no reason why we should not dispose of the nomination for a president some time tonight. I shall call the vice chairman to the chair when Missouri's name is called, and will nominate Cockrell. I was determined no one should say I had done anything to endanger his chances."

At 2:13 Mr. Bryan entered the hall and was cheered heartily. The movement began in the galleries in the center of the hall and spread to the platform. Some of the delegates also joined in the cheering. A majority of the delegates remained seated during the demonstration, which continued for many minutes.

The raising of the banner of Nebraska provoked a continuation of the cheering. The standards of Missouri, Iowa, North Dakota and Kentucky were carried to Nebraska with a tremendous din. All this was done while delegates were almost wholly in their seats.

A Parker banner was next unfurled, causing the wildest possible scene, the entire convention apparently joining in the uproar. It was lifted by Georgia. South Carolina and Arkansas went up, too.

At 2:30 Alabama's banner had joined the others. Pennsylvania's standard also moved. New Jersey's standard was carried up. Indiana joined the others and Connecticut followed. West Virginia's was also put forward.

The Bryanites hissed the name of Parker as the Georgians shouted it.

At 2:34 the convention was quieting down after eighteen minutes of tumult.

Temporary Chairman Williams announced the order of business through a megaphone. He called for the report of the committee on credentials. At 2:40 Mr. Bryan proceeded to the platform. He carried with him to the platform a document which was evidently the minority report of the committee on credentials, whose report had been called for.

When the convention adjourns today it will be until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, when the committee on platform will report.

James M. Head, of Tennessee, was nominated by James W. Ridgeway, of New York, for permanent chairman; John J. Fitzgerald, of Rhode Island, a Hearst supporter, nominated J. Corrigan, of Minnesota. The question of Hearst or Parker men controlling the committee depended upon the selection of the chairman, and the Tennessee delegation are avowed supporters of the New York delegation.

On the vote the Parker men won a decisive victory, Mr. Head being elected by a vote of 32 to 12.

Mr. Bryan explained to the committee that he had been busy on the platform committee during the time the Illinois contests were being considered. All he asked was the right to make a minority report to the convention. This was granted.

The committee gave hearing to every contest presented except that of Dr. Mary Walker, claiming a seat in the convention as the woman representative of the democrats of New York. Dr. Walker waited patiently the indulgence of the committee until a late hour, and then gave up in despair.

The Maine contest, involving three seats, was decided against the Hearst delegates and in favor of those on the temporary roll. The New Jersey contests were decided in the same way.

It was said that Mr. Bryan would make his greatest effort before the convention in speaking to a minority report from the committee on credentials. He has secured the proxy of Mr. Casper, the Nebraska member of the committee, and will himself present the minority report. At the same time it is understood he will not attempt to fight the report of the committee on resolutions.

S. H. Cowan, of Fort Worth, Tex., was admitted to present the following proposed plank in the interest of cattle shippers: We favor such amendments to the act to regulate commerce as will afford to the public and to shippers a speedy, adequate and effectual remedy against unreasonable or otherwise unlawful transportation charges.

Mr. Bryan went direct from the convention after adjournment to the committee on platform and immediately entered upon the work in hand there.

W. J. Shultheis called out some of the members of the committee to urge upon them the importance of a vigorous protest against the non-enforcement of the eight-hour law.

Dr. Mary Walker, attired in her usual garb of Prince Albert coat and trousers, was the first person to enter the committee room, and she remained throughout the proceedings. She claims a seat in the convention. She says she was regularly elected a woman delegate by the democrats of Oswego, N. Y., and will make a contest to be seated.

The committee took a short recess in order to secure from the national committee the record of the contests heard by that body.

By a unanmous vote the committee decided to award six seats and six votes each to the delegation from the Philippines and the Porto Rican delegation.

The Hearst delegates declare that they will carry the Illinois contest to the floor of the convention and fight to the last.

For second place on the ticket it can hardly be said that speculation centers on any one man. A half dozen names are on the tongues of the crowds.

Among those mentioned for second place were George Turner, of Washington; Judge Judson Harmon, of Ohio; J. R. Williams, of Illinois; Adlai E. Stevenson, of Illinois; Joseph W. Folk, of Missouri; David S. Rose, of Wisconsin; Samuel Alschuler, a former Illinois gubernatorial candidate; James B. Kilbourne, of Ohio; Governor Dockery, of Missouri, Edward C. Wall, of Wisconsin, and Richmond P. Hobson, of Alabama.

The Alabama delegation took a strong stand against the nomination of former Senator George W. Turner, of Washington.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas, it is currently reported by the local press that the Alabama delegation is favorable toward the nomination of Hon. George W. Turner, of Washington, for vice president,

"Resolved, That it is the sense of the Alabama delegation that it would be unwise to nominate Hon. G. W. Turner for vice president, and that a copy of this resolution be given to the press."

This resolution was adopted by the Alabama delegation because Turner was one of the deputy marshals during the regime of Judge Busteed at Mobile. The memory of these days is still fresh in the minds of too many Alabamians to permit without protest the nomination of a participant in outrages not exceeded for flagrancy in the whole back history of the reconstruction.

It is thought that other southern states will follow the lead of the Alabama delegation and that the Turner boom is doomed.

The Alabama delegation is meeting with great consideration and is making a fine impression and one frequently hears it said that Alabama has one of the strongest delegations from the south.

The undercurrent for Gorman has been very strong. Half the Alabama delegation is for him.

Contrary to expectation, Congressman Clayton did not decline the national committeeship, but on the other hand accepted it with thanks.

G. W. Pratt moved that the delegation cast its vote for Captain Hobson for the vice presidency, but withdrew it.

The committee on credentials met immediately after the adjournment of the convention and perfected a temporary organization by electing E. M. Robinson, of Mobile, Ala., as temporary chairman and A. M. Daly, of Delaware, as temporary secretary.

At the session of the sub-committee of the committee on platform, Mr. Bryan made a strenuous plea for the reaffirmation of the Kansas City platform on trusts. Mr. Bryan said that the first pronouncement of 1900 had met with the general approval of the public, and that unless something better is presented would insist upon the Kansas City plank.

Hon. D. M. Delmas, who will nominate William R. Hearst for the presidency before the St. Louis convention, is not a politician. He has never held political office of any kind and never attended a national convention. He is, however, one of the foremost lawyers and probably the most gifted orator of the Pacific coast. As an extemporaneous speaker he probably has no equal in the west. He is a native of California and was selected by Hearst to name him because California is Hearst's native state as well as because of his oratorical powers.

The District of Columbia contest was called by the credentials committee. Cotter D. Bride and Mrs. Schuelice were heard on behalf of the contesting delegation. Each of the six contestants, it was stated, represented organized labor. Attorney McIntyre, one of the delegates seated by the national committee and representing the anti-Hearst faction, occupied fifteen minutes in showing the regularity of his delegation. The Norris or anti-Hearst faction was seated by a practically unanimous vote.

Vardaman, of Mississippi, is a striking figure in the convention. He is dressed in white and his long hair is black and people constantly ask who he is.

Parker's daughter was on the platform and shook hands with Bryan while the convention applauded.

Judge Parker was inaccessible to visitors Thursday. He spent the morning in his study attending to business. His mail is increasing daily. The reports of the convention at St. Louis were telephoned to Private Secretary McCausland, who communicated the news to Judge Parker, but otherwise there was nothing to indicate the remotest interest in the St. Louis convention. It was said Judge Parker has had no communication with any one since the convention met.

President Roosevelt devoted the greater part of Thursday in his library. He spent considerable time with Secretary Loeb transacting official business brought through the mails. After disposing of these the president did some work on his address to be delivered in response to the official notification of his nomination.

PASSING OF MEDICINAL PLANTS.

They Will Be Rapidly Exterminated Unless Precautions Are Soon Taken.

The approaching extermination of our chief medicinal plants, unless measures are taken for protecting and cultivating them, is predicted in the Journal of Pharmacy, by Dr. Kraemer. Says the British Medical Journal, in a notice of this article:

"Some well-known plants as spigelia, serpentaria, and senega, which in the time of Linnaeus were found in abundance in Maryland and other Atlantic States, are already becoming scarce. It is well known that some plants have been improved by cultivation, and it may reasonable be supposed that all can be when the peculiar requirements of each have been ascertained. Dr. Kraemer urges a study of these plants in their natural surroundings in order that they may be successfully cultivated and conserved. Many of the medicinal plants now in use are being cultivated in the United States. It is stated that 40,000,000 pounds of peppermint are produced annually near Kalamazoo, Mich. Castor beans, from which castor oil is obtained, are grown in the Western and Middle States. Valerian is produced in Vermont. Digitalis purpurea, atropa belladonna, sanguinaria canadensis, cimicifuga racemosa and many equally valuable plants have been raised experimentally in America; and, in Dr. Kraemer's opinion, could be grown successfully with the proper cultivation. He urges the further cultivation of certain plants, such as senna, colocynth, gentian, poppy, etc., which have been introduced into the United States and grown there to some extent. He believes that three-fourths of all medicinal plants are grown either wild or in cultivation in the United States, and that fully one-fourth of the remaining fourth could be successfully raised there. He points out that Americans must realize the necessity of protecting their forests and plants, and must consider their care and preservation a duty both to themselves and to future generations."

Cut-Rate Telegrams.

Wireless telegraphy is rapidly coming into commercial utility in Germany, and large numbers of "spark messages," as such telegrams are called, are transmitted daily. There is a service in operation between Denmark and Prussia, while two German steamers running between Kiel and Korsoer are equipped with instruments and maintain continuous communication with both German and Danish land stations. The system employed is the Slaby-Arco. Private messages are accepted at the two offices—at Bulk, near Kiel, and on the Isle of Fehmarn. A fee of seventeen cents is charged for every message transmitted from one station to the other, irrespective of the number of words it contains, and it is thence despatched to any part of Germany or Denmark at a cent a word.

Success Easier Than Failure.

The principles that win success are very simple and few in number. They are easily remembered. Here they are: First, industry, but not overwork; second, willingness to profit by the experience of others; third, ability, coupled with modesty; fourth, simple and correct habits; fifth, honesty, politeness and fairness. Any one of ordinary ability who practices these rules cannot avoid success. Success is easier than failure.—Atchison Globe.

It is reported that the Bessemer rolling mill will start up Monday, but nothing definite can be learned, as the officials of the company will not make any statement in regard to the matter, but some of the furnaces have been fired up. THE PEOPLE'S PRIMARY WILL BE HELD ON TUESDAY, JULY 26th, 1904.

DEMOCRACY?

Thorsby, Ala., July 11, 1904.

Editor Union—As we saw your beacon visage on last Saturday down at Kliners Grove, in beat 8, at the barbecue, I will not attempt to acquaint you with the things which transpired on that occasion, as that eagle eye of yours took in pretty well all that was worth seeing, I guess. But we will ask you to stand by as a witness while we relate some things to the good people of this county who were not there and consequently can not appreciate or realize all that is transpiring in this "land of the free and the home of the brave."

We will say that the social features of the occasion were but a repetition of many like gatherings in different sections of this fair southland, the young and the old, the middle-aged and fair women, young ladies as pretty and sweet looking as can be found anywhere, and fine specimens of young men who in one way or another constitute the future hope of this country, all mixing and mingling in social fraternity which was pleasant to see, except a certain "hoodlum" element who seemed pretty heavily loaded with "booze;" a bountiful dinner of barbecued meat and other good things to eat. And of course candidates galore were there, all smiling and shaking the hands of the dear, good people like a thirsty boy on a hot day at a pump handle. But the thing to be long remembered and never forgotten was the speeches of Hon. L. H. Reynolds and Judge Richardson, of Montgomery. Of course this limited space will not allow us only to touch some of the main points, which we feel should be "known unto all men."

First, then, we call attention to the speech of Judge Richardson, which, like all democratic speeches, carried a heavy load of buncombe and bosh about negro domination and white supremacy; but along with this slush and twangdoodle and a confession of the sins of his party in the past, of frauds and ballot box theft, he, of course, like the rest, claimed that now since they have a new constitution they are honest and upright, saying that the populists had made them honest, etc. But almost in the next breath, with unblushing shame, he told the people that unless they were represented in the legislature by a democrat that they would never get their rightful share of the public school funds. Yes, sir, he actually told the folks that the demies were stealing school money from the children in white counties and giving it to the children of the black belt (a charge which we have made against them for years, and they denying it), and there were a lot of nair-brained, mutton-headed gilhoolies there throwing their hats in the air and splitting their goozles, while they, poor fools, were a part of the victims of this damnable practice of debauchery and theft. How it is that men with a thimbleful of brains could do such a thing is beyond the comprehension of ordinary mortals, but we have some folks when they have been hypnotized with a negro ghost, why you can just give them a bowl of buzzard soup and they will swear its "lasses." But this is by no means all he told us. Among other things he said that if the democratic party should ever become menaced by any other party in the state that they would again register the negro and vote him as they used to do, and if it should be necessary they would register dead ones as well as live ones. Now, good people, I want to say right here that all democrats do not indorse such things and are blind to the real sins and doings of their party, and long standing prejudice holds them in line. But such is the course of the so-called democratic party, ruled and controlled by a class of mere politicians and heelers who are as void of conscience and true regard for honesty and right as a guinea hog is of cleanliness and high moral rectitude.

But let me tell you one thing, Reynolds, our Reynolds, most certainly roasted the judge alive and burned it into the bone, but never touched his heart, for that he had no heart to touch, and if we can only get a few more speeches like that made in this county we would have nothing more to do but stay at home until election day and the victory would be ours.

L. B. POUNDS.

What Mr. Pounds has said above in regard to Judge Richardson's speech is correct. The judge made those statements about the children's money and the registration of dead negroes, incredible as it may sound. And again, Judge Richardson having been asked a question by one of the audience about the negro jurors in Dallas county, took occasion to refer to a case he himself had in the United States court in Montgomery when he defended a man accused of illicit distilling. The judge says "there were six black negroes on that jury and when I had to say gentlemen of the jury to them I felt like going to the window and heaving up." A voice in the crowd asks, "Who put those negroes on that jury?" Judge Richardson answers, "A man formerly a democrat who was bought by Roosevelt with a place and indorsed by Booker Washington." If Judge Jones is not a democrat now what is he?

Clanton, July 13th, 1904.

To the Voters and Taxpayers of Chilton County:

I wish to say that since having an opportunity of meeting many of my friends and being by many of them solicited to withdraw my announcement for the office of probate judge and to announce for re-election as tax assessor, and having given the matter very careful consideration, and as the present term of my office is extended to August 1, 1905, I have decided to withdraw from the race for probate judge and to announce for re-election as tax assessor. It seems to be the wish of a great many of my friends, and besides if I should have been elected probate judge I'd have to resign the assessorship and a democrat would have been appointed in my place for the balance of the term. Now I wish to say again to the voters and all the people of the county, that I feel myself under lasting obligations to them for their hearty support and kindness to me in the past, and should they see proper to give me the office another term, I promise to serve them to the very best of my ability, giving them every opportunity that I can for their convenience and for saving them expense and trouble, as I have done in the past.

Yours very truly,
A. C. MIMS.

PLEASANT GROVE.

We just wish to say amen to Commissioner Riggins' letter in last week's UNION. It has the right ring—the ring of true populism. Let all of our officers do likewise. Our campaign is moving on nicely; the people seem to be solid as a brick wall. Then we have some speakers hard to beat; for instance, L. H. Reynolds, L. B. Pounds and J. H. Thomas. In them we have a trio that the state of Alabama can not eclipse. All honor to them.

ONE OF THE BOYS.

THORSBY.

July 8, 1904.

Editor Union—The rally at Pleasant Grove on July 2d was grand. S. J. Jennings spoke to a large crowd; it lasted two hours. The crowd was well entertained, so, as the report says, there was the speaker, one democrat, and a Reynolds man, so the speaker says. Also at Macedonia in the morning there was four there, one boy and three men. Hurrah, boys, for the ticket. I'll name Judge Reynolds, Treasurer Bice, Assessor Pounds, Collector Thomas and Commissioner Mahan. These are good men, boys. We are having fine rains now. Look out for the man with the fool's face, boys. Keep in line, boys, for July 26th. Every one look out for the ticket. With best wishes to THE UNION and its many readers. T. M. DRIVER.

(Communicated.)
BESSIE.

Bessie is all right. She will be heard from later on. As the campaign draws to a close certain candidates grow more conspicuous and formidable. Among such we find our popular brother, J. H. Thomas, candidate for tax collector. Mr. Thomas is "true grit;" he never treats with the enemy if he should be defeated he will still hold up the cause of the people. Give us a ticket composed of Reynolds, Thomas, Pounds, Bice and Collins, and we'll have a ticket of power. So let the people honor Mr. Thomas on the 26th and place the laurels of victory on his brow and we'll have an efficient and worthy collector.

"EYES AND EARS."

Clanton, July 8, 1904.

Editor Union—A few lines in reply to a letter in the banner over the signature of "Guess It's Me," Now, Mr. "Guess it's Me," I want to tell you before I set on you that if you would stick your head out of the bushes so I could see how you looked, I'd know better how to reply to you. Anyway, you remind me of a catfish, all mouth and no brains. You asked why a man couldn't be a populist and go to the democrats and still be a gentleman? Who's said you couldn't? But I say it is a good big job to be a populist, go to the democrats, write positive falses, sign a fictitious name to it and be a gentleman. You asked what kind of a fall I took when I fell from the sheriff's office. Well, Mr. G. I. M., I got out of the sheriff's office honorably. I told the solicitor six months beforehand that I was going to resign on account of the construction of the jail. I also told the chairman of the populist party some time before I resigned that I was going to resign. I told my lawyer that I was going to resign; also E. B. Deason and several others. I told the chairman of my party that I would recommend any one the party would bring up, but it would amount to nothing, for the governor wouldn't appoint any one but a democrat, and I told him I was going to recommend Mr. Morgan, as I thought he was a conservative man, and I thought it was my duty to leave it in as good hands as possible. I want to tell you Mr. "Guess It's Me," you can write lies to the banner and try to make the people think I sold out the sheriff's office, but you are too big a coward to tell me so. Now I want to say a man can be a democrat and be a gentleman, but no gentleman will write such an insult as the letters you have written in this and week before last's banner. I want the public to read this, and if you have any grit in your gizzard, you will not take this: You are a coward if you do take it. Now, "Sunday School Boy," "Guess It's Me," or whatever your name may be, you started this controversy, so you had better stop it. If you ain't satisfied, come to me like a man should and we will settle it and not worry the public any more. Respectfully,

MOSES A. KILLGORE.

WALLACE C. EDLER, Agent, Clanton, Alabama.

In the Royal Society Proceedings there is described a comparison of plants grown under normal conditions with similar plants grown in an atmosphere containing about three and one-half times the normal amount of carbon dioxide. The investigators, Dr. Farmer and S. E. Chandler, state that under abnormal conditions the internodes remained shorter and the surface growth of the leaves is arrested earlier. The number of stomata per unit area of leaf is much greater, but, owing to the reduced size of the epidermal cells, the proportion of stomata cells is not altered; the guard cells of the stomata are not, however, reduced in size. The anatomical structure of the stem varies very slightly, in some cases the wood vessels are fewer in number, and this is probably correlated with the diminution in size of the leaves, although disturbance of the general metabolic processes is also quite a possible explanation.

The Pratt City Lumber company has sold its entire stock and buildings to the Propst Lumber company.

CONCORD

Editor Union—Crops are good in this part of the county, but the hail on the 2d inst. swept a space about two miles wide. I was at Calera on the 4th of July and heard some good speaking by Judge Longshore and Major Oliver. The major is a good speaker and a good man and we love him. He was my captain in the Cuban war and he was not afraid to fight, and also to help cut the barbed wire from around Santiago, but yet we never can vote for him while he stays in the pen with the democrats. Eighteen years ago I was the only republican that voted at Providence. You see, I've always been afraid of low wages and soup houses, but now we are going to carry Providence box this time. "We'll bid farewell to democrats, and wipe our weeping eyes." VOTER.

MARS HILL.

Editor Union—We've had a good rain and the prospect is fine for corn, cotton and watermelons. We sure had a great and glorious Fourth of July, playing ball at Mr. Tom Cobb's the second nines of Providence and Scotland played before dinner. The score stood 6 to 2 in favor of the Scotland boys. Tom Cofer's batting was a feature of the game. After the game was over a great long table was spread with such a good dinner, provided by the neighbors who had come together to celebrate the day. I tell you those ball players feasted. After dinner, about 2 o'clock, the first nines of Providence and Scotland crossed bats for a game and when the game ended Scotland was the winner by a score of 20 to 2. There was some great batting done by Messengers John Cofer, Armon Scott and C. W. Langston. After the game was over ice cold lemonade was furnished as much as any one wanted, and then we had some good singing and then went home with the consciousness of having spent a good day and had a good time. Some of our young folks went to Pleasant Grove to the all-day singing and report a good time. Another party went to Six Mile creek fishing, but we've not heard yet how many fish they caught. Goodby till the watermelons are ripe.
SUNDAY SCHOOL SCHOLAR.

CONCORD.

Everything is progressing fine. Have not had much rain through this part of the county, yet the crops are looking well. Our picnic on the 2d has increased our Sunday school very much. We had several nice visitors to our Sunday school last Sunday, among them Mr. Crumpton, of Birmingham.

CHAPTER MASONS.

Clanton Chapter Royal Arch Masons held a public installation at the Baptist church Tuesday night, Grand Secretary George Beauchamp, of Montgomery, was installing officer and delivered the "tools" and charges in an impressive manner. Officers installed were: J. P. Vanderveer, H. P.; Guy Higgins, K.; W. H. Sartor, S.; W. T. Aldridge, C. of H.; E. A. Matthews, P. S.; W. I Mullins, T.; Allie C. Smith, S.; J. R. Mullins, R. A. C.; E. B. Deason, M. of third veil; J. Watts Moore, M. of second veil; E. G. Hyman, M. of first veil; E. A. Knight, sentinel. On entering the church the eye was caught by a veritable bouquet of young ladies, relieved by a few thorns in the way of men, the whole constituting the choir, who rendered the music incidental to the services. Rev. R. R. Ellison delivered the opening prayer. After the ceremonies were concluded, the chapter and invited guests adjourned to the lodge room, where refreshments were served in the lower hall, which had been decorated for the occasion with the color of the chapter. Everybody enjoyed themselves, especially the ladies, who were highly delighted to explore the lodge room, hoping, yet fearing that they would come across skeletons or fierce goats or something of that kind.

SKETCH OF HENRY G. DAVIS,

Democracy's Candidate for the Vice Presidency.

Henry G. Davis, the democratic nominee for vice president, is a resident of Piedmont, W. Va. Mr. Davis is more than 80 years of age. He was reared on a farm and when 20 years of age went into the service of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad company, for which institution he worked fourteen years.

In 1858 he began mining coal in the neighborhood of Piedmont, W. Va., and about the same time started a banking institution, which soon became the Piedmont National bank.

He was elected to the West Virginia legislature in 1865 and to the state senate in 1868 and 1870.

He was a member of the democratic national convention which nominated Horatio Seymour in 1868, and in 1872 which nominated Horace Greely. Mr. Davis was elected to the United States senate in 1870 and served two full terms.

Mr. Davis at this time is the unanimous choice of West Virginia democrats as their candidate for governor. His nomination to make his party's race with Judge Parker will, of course, eliminate him from this contest.

A strange coincidence in connection with Mr. Davis' nomination is the fact that he is the father-in-law of Stephen B. Elkins, republican United States senator from West Virginia, and one of the foremost men of his party.

MASSACHUSETTES COTTON MILLS RESUME.

They Employ 25,000 Persons Who Have Suffered Idleness.

Most of he Fall River Mass., cotton mills resumed operation Monday after a ten days' shut down. Many of the manufacturers are tiring of the curtail policy which has been in force nearly four months, and as soon as a new agreement, being worked out by many members of the Fall River Manufacturers' Association, is formally assented to, it is expected the mills will be more active. The operatives, of whom there are more than 25,000 in the cloth mills, are restless over the situation. They have sustained a loss in wages during the spring and summer amounting to a reduction of 40 per cent.

Fatal Assault.

At Greensboro, Ind., Mrs. William Starbuck died Monday from the effects of injuries received at the hands of unknown persons who are being trailed by bloodhounds. She and her child were found at the bottom of an abandoned well, one-eighth of a mile from home. Mrs. Starbuck was delirous and at no time did she recover conciousness sufficiently to give any information as to the identity of her assailants. During her delirium she was continually crying out, "What are you doing here?" and "What are you going to do?"

PARKER NOMINATED

Polls 658 on the First Ballot. Platform Adopted. Makes no Mention of Money

WAS IN SESSION ALL NIGHT.

Eight Names Were Presented to the Convention and Thirteen Received Votes in the Balloting.

When the national democratic convention reassembled, it was hoped by the leaders that the work might be concluded today and a sine die adjournment taken. When the delegates came together at the beginning of this, the third day, there yet remained to be accomplished the adoption of the platform and the nomination of candidates for president and vice president. It was appreciated that this might require three sessions, the last running into the night.

Chairman Clark arrived at 10 minutes after 10 o'clock and was received with a few handclaps. Twenty minutes later the delegates were in their seats. No word had been received from the resolutions committee and Chairman Clark dispatched a messenger to learn when it would be ready to report.

Private advices were to the effect that it would be several hours before the report would be prepared and the prospects for a short session grew stronger. One of the secretaries called through a megaphone: "The band will please play 'Home, Sweet Home.'"

There was a wild cheer from the weary perspiring delegates as the familiar strain floated out on the air. Anything with the word "home" seemed to please greatly, for the cheers were repeated a few minutes later when "My Old Kntucky Home" was rendered. "Dixie" called forth the inevitable yells.

The messenger Chairman Clark had sent to the committee on resolutions returned with a gloomy report of the unreadiness of that committee to appear with its important document and the waiting continued.

At 10:40 Chairman Clark arose and let fall his huge gavel. "The convention will be in order," he demanded. The clerk then announced the session would commence with prayer by Rabbi Sale, of St. Louis. The delegates and spectators at once arose to their feet and stood during the invocation.

At the conclusion of the prayer an announcement was made at the order of Chairman Clark that he was "determined to have order, and that any person raising a row will be taken out by the police."

A demand was made for the report of the resolutions committee. When no response was forthcoming it was determined to call the roll of states for the purpose of having the names of the next national committee announced. There were cheers at the announcement of several of the names.

Another call was made for the report of the committee on resolutions. As the call did not bring any result, the secretaries of the convention commenced to work the telephone vigorously in an effort to put the chairman of the convention in touch with the chairman of the committee in order to find out when he would be ready with his report.

Representative James, of Kentucky, moved that a committee of three be appointed to wait on the committee and ascertain when it would be ready to report. Carried.

Chairman Clark named Mr. James, H. D. Clayton, of Alabama, and T. N. Ball, of Texas, as the committee.

A motion was made and carried that Richmond Pearson Hobson, of Alabama, be invited to address the convention. Captain Hobson accepted the invitation and revealed the best and strongest voice thus far heard in the convention.

In speaking on the color question he declared that Booker T. Washington would soon outlive his undoubted usefulness if he did not cease to yield to the teachings and influence of the republican party and its chieftain. He urged the men of the west and north to refrain from oppressing the south by advocating anything that tended to obliterate the racial lines. He deprecated the fact that in the republican convention not one man had risen to speak against the plank in that party's platform which urged a reduction of southern representation in congress because of alleged disfranchisement of voters in the south. The speaker worked himself into a high pitch of excitement as with white face and ringing voice he drew a picture of the approaching battle between the parties and concluded with the words:

"Let us make the republicans name the battlefield and let us make them call it Waterloo."

In his efforts to secure order at the conclusion of Captain Hobson's speech Chairman Clark broke his gavel handle.

The committee, headed by Representative James, presented itself and Mr. James was introduced. His announcement was:

"Your committee to wait on the committee on resolutions report that they have discharged that duty. The committee informs us that they will be unable to report to this convention until 8 o'clock tonight, at which time they will bring to you a unanimous report, signed by every member of the committee."

Great applause and cheers greeted this last statement and as soon as Mr. James could be heard again he continued:

"New York, Nebraska, Virginia and Wisconsin have all joined hands and will bring in a platform that will carry us to a glorious victory in November."

Mr. James followed his last announcement at once with a motion to adjourn until 8 o'clock tonight. A second was at once heard, and the motion carried, the session closing at 11:58.

At the night session the convention adopted a platform by a viva voce vote and listened to nominating speeches for president. Judge Alton B. Parker was nominated by Martin W. Littleton and William Randolph Hearst by D. M. Delmas. Both orators were applauded at length.

Nominating speeches for favorite sons, candidates and seconding speeches for both Parker and Hearst occupied the convention for several hours.

Senator Daniel concluded reading the platform at 8:55 o'clock.

When it was observed that he had ceased reading the convention broke into cheers.

Senator Daniel said:

"I am unanimously instructed by your committee on platform to move the previous question of its adoption, and I now make that motion."

It was adopted by a viva voce vote, two or three delegates voting in the negative, and they apparently in a spirit of fun. Chairman Clark then put the motion to adopt and another viva voce carried it.

Temporary Chairman Williams then mounted the steps leading up to the platform, swung his hat around his head and the delegates following his lead roared their applause again and again, while the band played "Hail Columbia."

The great climax of the convention, the nomination of a candidate for president, followed immediately upon the adoption of the platform.

"The clerk will now call the roll of states for the nomination of a candidate for president," shouted the chairman.

"Alabama!" shrieked the clerk.

"Alabama yields to the Empire state New York," called Delegate Russell, of Alabama, standing in his chair, one arm grasping the standard of his state marker.

Martin W. Littleton took the stand amid ringing applause to place Judge Parker, of New York, in nomination.

Mr. Littleton was given close attention. For the first time during the session there was silence in the hall.

A terrific outburst of cheering followed Mr. Littleton's remark about Parker, "If you ask me why he has been silent, I answer because he has not attempted to be the master of his party, but is content to be its servant."

The greatest demonstration at the close of Mr. Littleton's speech was on the floor of the convention and confined largely to the delegates.

New York began waving a great mass of flags, and the state standards began to be moved up alongside that of the empire state.

Then was enacted a scene that recalled an incident of the democratic convention in Chicago which nominated William J. Bryan eight years ago.

Two girls in white sprang to the front of the platform and waved flowers and flags. With renewed outbursts the immense throng cheered them until a picture of Judge Parker attracted thunderous cheering. The cheering continued 25 minutes. Arkansas yielded to Tennessee and Senator Carmack took the platform and seconded the nomination of Judge Parker.

California, a Hearst state, was next in order. D. M. Delmas, of that state, was recognized and there was cheering as he made his way to the platform, but it was not prolonged. The hall was a bedlam when Mr. Delmas concluded.

The band played: "We Won't Go Home Till Morning."

L. Irving Handy, of Delaware, nominated Judge George M. Gray.

David Overmeyer, of Kansas, placed General Nelson A. Miles in nomination.

Delegate Roesing, from Minnesota, interposed a motion that all seconding speeches be limited to one minute. Governor Dockery moved to amend by making the time five minutes. The amendment was lost on a viva voce vote. After a parliamentary squabble, the time was fixed at four minutes.

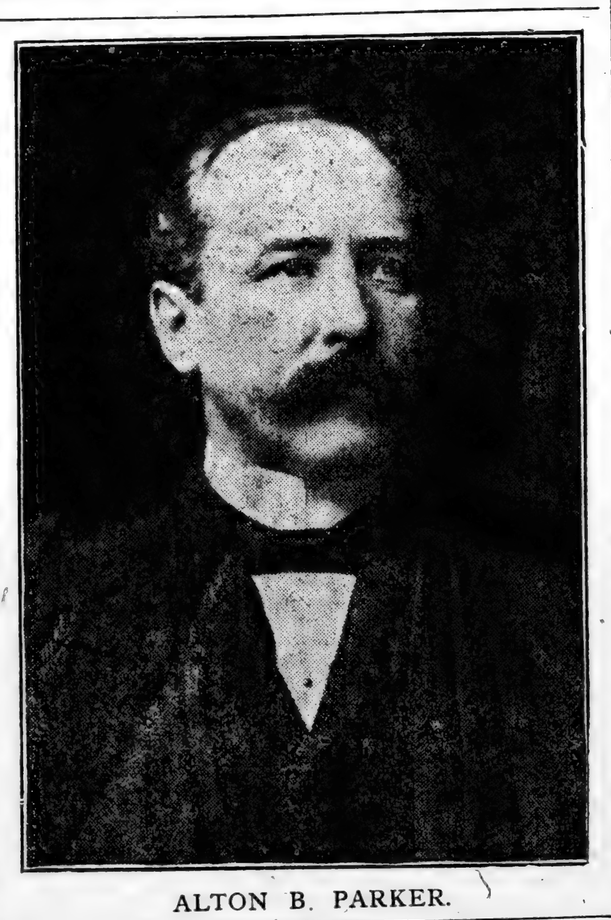
Maine gave way to Missouri, and Champ Clark, of that state, nominated Senator Francis M. Cockrell, of Missouri, for the presidency.

"Massachusetts," called the clerk, and Patrick A. Collins, of Boston, nominated Richard Olney, of the Old Bay state.

When Nebraska was called the noise of the convention was hushed as the name fell from the clerk's lips. C. J. Smythe responded, but before he could speak the name of "Bryan, was heard above the uproar. "Bryan, Bryan, Bryan," yelled the crowd. Mr. Bryan finally arose and standing in his chair endeavored to quiet the demonstration, but he was only an incentive for fresh outbursts.

When he could make himself heard, he simply announced that Wisconsin had a candidate present and Nebraska yielded her place on the roll call to that state. David S. Rose, mayor of Milwaukee, placed Edward C. Wall in nomination.

Chairman Cole, of the North Dakota delegation, nominated John Sharp Williams, of Mississippi.



ALTON B. PARKER.

On the first ballot, at 5:39 a. m. of Saturday, Judge Alton Brooks Parker, of New York, was nominated, having a total of 658 votes.

The first and only ballot resulted:

Parker	658
Hearst	200
Cockrell	42
Olney	38
Wall	27
Gray	12
Williams	8
Pattison	4
McClellan	3
Miles	3
Coler	2
Gorman	2
Towne	2

The convention adjourned until 1 o'clock.

The news of Judge Parker's nomination was given to him as he was coming out of the water after a morning swim. "Well, Judge, you've got it," cried the reporter as the judge appeared over the bow of the barge from which he had been diving. "Is that so?" replied the judge, his ruddy face breaking into a cherry smile in which satisfaction was undisguised.

The debate on the money plank of the platform in the committee on platform of the national democratic convention was opened by Rufus N. Rhodes, of Alabama, who declared that he would not vote for reaffirmation of the Chicago or Kansas City platform nor for the gold plank proposed by David B. Hill.

Members of the committee declare Mr. Rhodes made a distinct impression, and it also fell to the lot of Mr. Rhodes at the close of the fifteen hours' continuous deliberation of the committee to enjoy the honor of making the motion to adopt the platform as a whole, which unanimously prevailed, Hill and Bryan both voting in the affirmative.

A correspondent says: David B. Hill has received no ovation at the convention nor has he taken part in the deliberations other than the action on the committee platform. He has studiously avoided publicity, yet it is the hand of Hill that is guiding the convention upon its course.

MEMORIAL PRESENTED

To Spanish Admiral By American Citizens.

As a demonstration of gratitude regarding his conduct at Santiago and his care of American sailors, Admiral Cervera was presented with an engrossed message bearing the signatures of a number of well known Americans, besides letters from the subscribers bound in a volume.

The admiral, in returning thanks for this manifestation of American good will, said his conduct toward Lieutenant Hobson and the American sailors after the sinking of the Merrimac had been inspired by superior orders.

Admiral Cervera had repeatedly refused to permit his American admirers to honor him, but notwithstanding these refusals the plan to make the presentation was carried out.

ANTS WILL COME.

Texas Injunction Dissolved—Insects Harmless to Man.

The injunction proceedings instituted in Texas to prosecute the government experiments with the Guatemala boll weevil-eating ants have been dissolved, and O. F. Cook, the expert who discovered the ants, will go to Victoria, Tex., to install the colonies of ants in such a way they can be carefully studied. The ants which are now in New Orleans are in good condition and more numerous than when they started from Guatemala.

Mr. Cook says that it is highly important to learn the adaptability of the ants to different climates and soils as found in Texas, so that in case of necessity they may be exterminated absolutely and easily if undesireable traits appear. He says the ants are thoroughly predatory in their habits; that their movements are slow; that they may be handled with impunity, and that they are as harmless as toads.

SULTAN AGREES

To Demands Made by the American Minister.

A dispatch from Constantinople says that American Minister Leishmann handed a note to the porte declaring that unless a prompt settlement of the school question was arranged, a United States fleet would appear in Turkish waters. The Sultan ordered the grand vizer to comply with the American minister's demand.

The demands on the sultan by Minister Leishmann are for private grounds to schools and colleges conducted by American teachers equal to those given foreign teachers; for permission by American professional men to practice on even terms with foreigners, and for the direct access of the American minister to the sultan in the transaction of business

After reconsidering its action in indorsing the candidacy of President Roosevelt for re-election in place of making its own nominations, the national liberal party nominated William T. Scott, of East St. Louis, and W. C. Payne, of Warrenton, Va., for president and vice president, respectively, of the United States. S. P. Mitchell, of Memphis, declined the nomination for first place on the negro ticket, but will manage the campaign as chairman of the executive committee.

May Go to Greenwood, Miss.

The Greenwood board of trade is in correspondence with the owners of one of the largest furniture factories in the state of Vermont with a view of bringing the big industry to Greenwood. The owners of the plant have decided to move it to the south, where raw material can be more readily obtained. The company has a capital stock of nearly half a million, and employs several hundred skilled mechanics.

Russian Cloth.

It is officially announced that henceforth where cotton or woolen goods manufactured in Russia are exported to foreign countries or to the Amur country, the duties paid on foreign materials, authorized in their production, will be refunded. A rebate will also be allowed on the duties paid on imported machinery used in the manufacture of such goods.

Sunday at Atlantic City, N. J., the Jewish Chautauqua opened.

Fire and Explosion.

At Chicago, the plant of the National Provision Company was damaged $75,000 by fire. As a result of the fire a terrific explosion occurred in a big new sewer in Thirty-ninth street. For a distance of a mile along the thoroughfare manhole covers were sent high in the air and the street surface was so damaged that car and wagon traffic was suspended for the day.

SEWING AT NIGHT.

The best of all lights for sewing at night is the good old-time lamp well filled with kerosene oil, the well trimmed blaze covered with an opaque white porcelain shade. Having settled the question of light, use some judgment in the selection of the material on which to sew. On black and very dark colors, and red, are particularly trying to the eyes, as is material with fine stripes or checks. Reserve such goods for daylight work, and at night work on white and delicate colors as much as you can. By right planning, the different colors can be made up under the best light, and thus save much needless exhaustion. Changing from one color to another in sewing at night will sometimes prove very restful if the eyes are becoming tired.

TO JUDGE A WATERMELON.

It is a specially difficult matter to judge the quality of a watermelon from its appearance, because the edible portion is so far from the outside. Weight is the first consideration, the heavier the better, indicating that the melon is full of juice. Some persons affirm that if in pressing the sides together a peculiar crispy sound is heard, the chances are the melon is ripe and sweet, while a well known expert says that his method is to lay a melon on its back with the white part up, then scratch the skin of the lightest part. If this seems tender and the melon is yet firm to the pressure of the finger so that he can with difficulty pierce it with the nail, it is probably a good melon.

HOOD FOR THE STOVE.

Every woman should have a hood to hang over her kitchen stove to carry off smoke and unpleasant odors. A tinner may be instructed to make an inexpensive one after these directions:

Make a tin box, 24 inches square by 22 inches deep, and without top or bottom. Eight inches from the bottom trim the corners and bend them into the shape of a square pyramid. Bend the tin backs at the top, leaving an opening eight inches in diameter. Around this hole rivet a four-inch iron pipe 12 or 14 inches long. Rivet a four-inch pipe four inches long at right angles into a joint of the stovepipe or into the elbow, if the stovepipe enters the chimney in the kitchen. Fit the other end of this pipe with a stopper or cap which can be taken off.

In one side of the box make a door four inches high and eight inches wide to serve as a flap to raise while turning pancakes on the stove, and a small elbow and with a piece of tin pipe to connect it with the stovepipe this useful article is complete.—Gertrude Dawson in The Housekeeper.

TO KEEP VEGETABLES FRESH.

I am sure we would all like to help keep the vegetables nice and fresh, until late in the spring. This may seem an impossibility to some, so I will tell you how I helped to keep them. Have the apples put into crates and set in the coolest part of the cellar. If they are kept where it is cool they will not wilt or rot so quickly. The potatoes should be put in the warmest and darkest part of the cellar, and, if they are liable to freeze, old carpets or papers can be wrapped around the crates. This makes a good protection for them. Potatoes and apples are much easier to handle if put into bushel crates. When the outside leaves of the cabbage heads get wilted they may be taken off and the heads wrapped in papers. This will keep them nice and fresh. The celery, too, can be kept a long time if properly cared for. When it is taken from the ground see that it is not pulled up by the tops, but carefully lifted out without bruising the plant. It should then be put in one corner of the cellar, with the tops up straight and the roots well covered with dirt. If the dirt is occasionally watered it will help to keep the plants. If one will but take only a little extra care to see that the vegetables are properly cared for they will be amply repaid in the spring.—Bessie Van Horn, in Tribune Farmer.

RECIPES.

Saute Bananas.—Remove the skins from the bananas, cut in halves, lengthwise, then in halves crosswise; dredge them with flour; put in a little butter in the frying pan, lay in the bananas; when browned slightly remove, sprinkle over powdered sugar; serve with half a cupful of sugar, one-fourth cup of lemon juice and one teaspoonful of butter warmed over the fire.

Potato Gems.—To one cup of warmed mashed potatoes add tablespoonful of butter, one teaspoonful of salt, the yolks of three eggs well beaten and one cupful of milk; pour this over one and one-half cupfuls of flour; beat well and add the whites of the eggs beaten stiff and two and one-half level teaspoonfuls of baking powder; fill greased gem pans two-thirds full; bake in a quick oven twenty minutes.

Hollandaise Sauce.—Heat four tablespoonfuls of vinegar, and when boiling pour it over two well beaten eggs, beating well; return to the fire and stir constantly until it thickens; then remove immediately and add two level tablespoonfuls of butter, salt and cayenne to the taste.

It's a poor sort of a man that is not a hero to his own wife, says the New Orleans Times-Democrat.

If wife or mother nags, don't think she is tired. Often the most unselfish and most affectionate of women fall into this habit.

Farming should be an ideal life, but, unluckily, not every man who would like to be his own boss is fit for the job.

Of this year's graduating class at Harvard 201 announce their intention of going into business, 84 of them directly, the other 117 by way of the law schools. The proportion of those entering the unconsummated professions gets smaller each year.

Whatever may be the final outcome of the war in the East, reasonable men will hardly repudiate the Russians in their strong desire to obtain convenient outlets for their products to the sea. What if the Slavonic people were peaceful Americans? They would get to the coast and stay there. The whole world should undertake to help them.

A good man can get the best results out of poor tools and implements. But what a pity to allow the waste of ability when a little capital invested would bring immediate success, comments the American Cultivator. Capacity is far more than dollars. The right man may venture a mortgage to buy implements that will reduce the cost of farm products.

If the farmers of Orange county, New York, can make good roads for $100 a mile they will confer an inestimable boom upon the entire state by demonstrating it, says the Philadelphia Record. They have formed an organization for the purpose of showing that for this trifling sum they can make as good roads as the state is now making at a cost of from $3000 to $4000 a mile, and they have proposed to make a sample of road and exhibit it to the State. If the farmers can be even fairly successful at so small a cost there will be no excuse for bad ones in New York, or Pennsylvania.

Two big steamship companies have important orders out now for new vessels. The Cunard line, as will be remembered, is being aided by the British government to build two new five-knot boats. These are to be ready in 1905 and are to be driven by turbine engines. Meanwhile the Cunard company will add two large steamers this year to its fleet. The Campania will be launched July 12. She and the Carmania will be of 21,000 tons and make nineteen knots. It is announced, also, that the Hamburg-American line has ordered another enormous ship, the Amerika, which will be ready in 1906. She will be built rather for comfort than speed, and will run from England to New York in eight days. She will be 700 feet long.

After commenting upon the failure of modern Portias who fill the courts of large cities, The Housekeeper propounds the question: "How long will it be before we have women jurors?" The modern juror, it goes on to say, is not a person of giant intellect, of profound learning, nor is he accustomed to grappling with weighty judicial matters. All that is required is a modicum of intelligence and a little common sense, and how often is this quality in demand not realized! There is another reason, it goes on to say, why women could not render as intelligent a verdict as men, especially in cases concerning their own sex. It quotes an English judge as saying that it would be much more satisfactory to litigants and save much valuable time if juries of women were employed in such cases as those involving dressmakers' claims, actions brought by maids against mistresses. If women are capable of making successful lawyers, there seems to be no reason why they should not make effective jurors.

How It Got Its Name.

Back in Clinton County, Pa., is a section which is rapidly becoming famous through the development of oil wells. In the midst of the village is a waterfall, which greeted the eyes of the first frontiersman who wended his way to that part of this State when it was still a part of Virginia. He measured the depth of the fall and found it to be seventy-six feet. The accuracy of the measurement has never been called into question, and the inhabitants of the town to this day address their mails addressed to "Seventy-six, Ky." The fall is of little volume during the summer months, but in the great beauty at all times. In the winter it is a roaring cataract. Indian Creek frequently goes on a rampage. The section was a favorite hunting ground of the Indians in the early days, and the creek derived its name from the number of deer antlers and spikes which are found in the fields around.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

The center of the production of the most important cereals—corn, wheat, oats, barley, rye and buckwheat—is in the aggregate, is in a few miles north of Quincy,

AN INTERNATIONAL MOTOR-BOAT RACE AT MONACO.

These fragile craft, driven by high-powered automobile engines, are only from twenty-five to forty feet long, yet they have attained a speed of nearly thirty miles an hour, or as great as that of a torpedo-boat destroyer six or eight times the length.

FRUIT STATUETTES.

Do you know that an orange may be turned into an article of amusement while you enjoy eating part of it at the same time? It will make very funny little statues, and you can become a fruit sculptor in no time.

First choose your subject. Take a Chinaman, for instance. You can make a lifelike Chinaman from two oranges, one large and one small.

Cut into the jacket of the little orange, carefully removong part of the peel so as to form the eyes and mouth, as shown in the picture.

Make the eyes small, the nose flat and broad and the mouth large. Then cut flaps out of the sides and turn them outward—these are the ears, which should be very large.

Now you get a chance to eat part of the larger orange, as you are to clean all the fruit from one-half, and turn the peel up neatly all around. This makes the hat with its brim. Stand the other half on its flat side, its curved top forming the Chinaman's chest and shoulders.

You can further dress him by paring a piece off around the hat brim, which will do for a beautiful yellow scarf. His eyebrows are formed by two sharp cuts over the eyes and he is completed by a pigtail made of a strand of twine, which can be fastened to the back of Hop Sing's head.

Origin of the Japanese.

The Japanese are not as mixed a race as the modern Britons, but they have a very complex origin. It is certainly not correct to regard them as originally Chinamen, for while they do possess Chinese blood, there is certainly a Korean strain in them, as well as one derived from the Malayans and another from the Ainos or aboriginal inhabitants of the islands—the "savages" of Japanese historians. There has, consequently, been none of that disastrous inbreeding which is fatal to animals, nations and aristocracies; and latterly there is evidence that the Jap is growing taller.—London Chronicle.

Derivation of "Panama."

It is supposed by some that Panama derived its name from the native word for butterfly. Explorers of the interior tells of swarms of butterflies which at times rise on slopes of the mountains in dense clouds darkening the sunshine. Others maintain that the name is from an Indian word meaning abounding in fish.

AN IDEAL FARM DIVISION

How a Well-Known Missouri Agriculturist Secures a Good Deal of Profit and Comfort.

The accompanying sketch shows the division of Mr. Decker's farm in Green County, Mo. Last year the crops raised were forty acres of wheat, forty acres of corn, forty acres of grass. In addition to this there were forty acres of pasture divided into two lots, with a small pasture next to the barn and feed lots.

As will be noted, Mr. Decker believes in tree planting and has a tract containing 1500 maple and cedar trees and in addition has trees planted along the streets or roads. He also believes in good roads, and has a strip of gravel road in front of his house and barn. A small calf pasture is provided next to the barn and a few acres of oats are grown in the southeast corner of the farm.

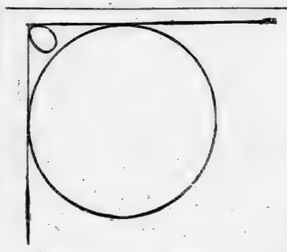
A pleasing feature of this farm is the large proportion of land in pasture and meadow. It is only by raising stock and leguminous crops that soil fertility can be maintained. Mr. Decker is one of Missouri's progressive and successful farmers.—Orange Judd Farmer.

A MAGICIAN AND HIS STRONG EGG

The writer once saw a magician hold up before his audience an egg and a cannon ball, and after talking a few minutes about the strength of an arch, and still more of a perfect dome—as represented by the shape of an egg—he remarked that few persons know how strong an egg really is.

"In proof of that," he said, "I will now place an egg, without covering of any kind, in such a position that no one can break it with the cannon ball."



HOW THE EGG IS PLACED.

How did he do it? Simply by putting the egg on the floor close in one corner of the room where the projecting walls gave it perfect protection, for the cannon ball, when rolled at it, struck the two walls and could not touch the egg.

PARKER AND DAVIS

Is the Ticket Nominated by the Democratic Party. Convention Adjourned.

A TELEGRAM FROM PARKER

Concerning His Position on the Money Question Caused Lengthy Discussion.

Saturday, when the convention reassembled, the startling announcement was whispered around that a sensation was to be sprung upon the convention at the eleventh hour.

It developed that Judge Parker had telegraphed his views on finance in which he declared for the gold standard and suggested that the convention should know this fact that it might be given an opportunity to select some one else for the party nominee, should his view not be in accordance with those of the delegates.

When this information circulated Bryan was absent, being at his hotel sick.

There was a rumor that Bryan would come to the convention, although ill, and make a fight against a gold standard plank.

Finally, shortly after 7 o'clock, when the convention had ordered a ballot for the nominee for vice president, and it was proceeding, Senator Culberson of Texas said that before a vice president was nominated "we had better find out who is to be the candidate for president first." Carried.

A little later the convention was called to order.

Alabama was called several times with no response, but finally Mr. Russell, of that state announced that Alabama would give way to Illinois, and Freeman B. Morris, named James R. Williams of Illinois.

Colorado yielded to Washington, and Fredrick C. Robertson spoke for former Senator George Turner.

Deleware gave her place in the call to West Virginia, and John D. Alderson placed in nomination Henry G. Davis, of West Virginia.

David Overmeyer of Kansas placed former Senator William A. Harris of that state in nomination.

At 9:10 o'clock Chairman Clark pounded vigorously with his gavel. He did not formally call the convention to order, but as soon as some degree of quiet had been restored, Governor Vardaman of Mississippi proceeded to address the convention on the subject of the mysterious telegram.

"We are here for the purpose of acting for the democratic party of this nation," said Governor Vardman, "and I want to say to you, and I believe that I voice the sentiment of every member of this convention, when I say that we have not deliberated at all since we have been here." (Applause.) He called for the message.

Delegate Raines of New York asked that the motion be deferred until the chairman of his delegation could be heard from.

John S. Williams, Governor Vardman, Senator Tillman and Senator Carmack made their way to the platform with the mysterious message in their possession.

Chairman Clark pounded for order with John S. Williams standing by his side.

"I wish to announce in advance," said the chairman, "that on this important matter, every man shall have a fair and full hearing. I now introduce John Sharpe Williams of Mississippi."

Mr. Williams said:

A telegram has come from Mr. Parker to Mr. Sheehan, and it is so important that we should know what it is. When you shall have heard it, you will note that there is not one word about requiring or demanding or asking, or requesting that anything should be placed in the democratic platform. You will also note that if there is any error in it at all, it is an error of judgment proceeding from too sensitive spirit of honor. He then handed the message to Governor Vardman who after requesting absolute quiet, read the telegram as follows:

"Hon W. F. Sheehan, Hotel Jefferson, St. Louis, Mo.:

"I regard the gold standard as firmly and irrevocably established and shall act accordingly if the action of the convention today shall be ratified by the people. As the platform is silent upon the subject my views should be made known to the convention, and if it is proved to be unsatisfactory to the majority I request you to decline the nomination for me at once, so that another may be nominated before adjournment.

"ALTON B. PARKER."

The following reply was read:

"The platform adopted by this convention is silent on the question of money standard, because it is not regarded by us as a possible issue in the campaign, and only campaign issues were mentioned in the platform. Therefore there is nothing in the views expressed by you in the telegram just received which would preclude a man entertaining them from accepting a nomination on said platform."

During the reading Mr. Bryan came into the hall. Instantly there was an uproar. Calls of "Bryan, Bryan!" went up and the galleries cheered. Mr. Bryan made his way to the stage.

His face was white. His voice was weak and hoarse. He spoke with great effort but quietly and with self control.

His declaration that the sending of the telegram to Judge Parker was a declaration of the gold standard side, and his statement that if the democracy was to adopt such a view, it should be honest and say it frankly, was greeted with a shriek of applause from the galleries. Loud applause greeted Mr. Bryan's remark that it was a manly thing in Judge Parker to express his opinions before the convention adjourned, but would have been a manlier thing had he spoken before the convention met, was again cheered. He announced that he would propose an amendment to this message.

J. B. Weaver of Iowa who twelve years ago was the presidential nominee of the populist party spoke. To send the telegram was equivalent to saying "All right judge; anything you want we will accede." Both applause and groans met this statement.

The chairman recognized Mr. Bryan who presented an amendment to the reply to Judge Parker as follows:

"But as you will, of elected, be called upon to act upon certain phases of the money question, we would like to know whether you favor reducing the volume of silver dollars or whether you favor an asset currency and branch national banks; whether you prefer national bank currency to United States notes."

Representative John Sharpe Williams was recognized. He plunged without preface into a scathing arraignment of Mr. Bryan. Turning from time to time he faced Mr. Bryan who sat with immobile countenance and fanned himself. His voice trembling Mr. Williams declared that Mr. Bryan had presented the spectacle of a man pleading harmony when in all this great convention his had been the only voice of discord. The amendments to the Parker telegram he characterized as a "lot of foolish questions." Mr. Williams suddenly wheeled and facing those on the platform asked:

"Suppose we had nominated Mr. Bryan on that platform."

"God forbid," ejaculated Richmond Pearson Hobson. Mr. Bryan sprang to his feet.

"I am going to withdraw this amendment," said Mr. Bryan. Our delegation will vote for the candidate for vice president that New York wants. We are not going to do one thing to mar the harmony of the convention.

After some debate a roll call was ordered on the question of the adoption of the Williams reply to Judge Parker's message to Mr. Sheehan.

It resulted: ayes 774 noes 191, and was ordered sent.

The order of business now went back to the point where Governor Vardaman sprung the Parker telegram rumor and asked for a recess just as the roll of states was about to be called for the vote for a candidate for vice president, and the chair directed the roll should be called.

Alabama, Arkansas and California went solidly for Davis, Turner scored seven on the Colorado vote and Williams received three at the same time. The final result of the first ballot was unofficially: Williams, 165; Turner, 100; Davis, 654; Harris, 58.

Iowa did not vote. The nomination of Davis was made unanimous. It was resolved that a full report of the proceedings of the convention should be printed.

Delegate John Lamb, of Indiana moved that the democratic national committee be authorized to fill any vacancy that might occur on the national ticket.

Chairman Champ Clark and Temporary Chairman John Sharpe Williams were made respectively chairmen of the committees to notify Judge Parker and ex-Senator Davis of their nomination. It was also announced that the new national committee would meet in New York on a date to be fixed by the chairman.

Senator McCreary of Kentucky presided in the closing moments of fthe convention.

At 1:31 o'clock Senator McCreary adjourned the convention sine die, the band playing "Auld Lang Syne."

ABOUT REGISTERING.

Extracts from the general election law of Alabama:

Section 2. The following persons shall be disqualified both from registering and voting: All idiots and insane persons; those who were by reason of conviction of crime disqualified from voting at the time of the ratification of the constitution on November 28, 1901; those who have been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted of treason, murder, arson, embezzlement, malfeasance in office, larceny, receiving stolen property, obtaining money under false pretenses, perjury, subornation of perjury, robbery, assault with intent to rob, burglary, forgery, bribery, assault and battery on wife, bigamy, living in adultery, sodomy, incest, rape, miscegenation, crime against nature, or any crime punishable by imprisonment in penitentiary, or for any infamous crimes or crime involving moral turpitude; also, any person who has been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted as a vagrant or tramp, or of selling or offering to sell his vote or the vote of another, or of making or offering to make false returns in any election by the people or in any primary election to procure the nomination or election of any person to any office, or of suborning any witness or registrar to secure the registration of any person as an elector. Provided that any person who is disqualified from voting by reason of conviction of any of the offenses mentioned in this section, except treason, whether the conviction was had in a state or federal court, has been pardoned, may be restored to his citizenship with right to vote by the governor, approved by the board of pardons and specially expressed in the pardon.

Sec. 7 1-2. The following persons and no others, who, if their place of residence shall remain unchanged, will have, at the date of the next general election, the qualifications as to residence prescribed by section 1 of this act, shall be qualified to register as electors, provided they shall not be disqualified under section 2 of this act:

1st. Those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who are physically unable to work; and those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who have worked or been regularly engaged in some lawful employment, business or occupation, trade or calling for the greater part of the twelve months next preceding the time they offer to register, and those who are unable to read and write, if such inability is due solely to physical disability; or,

2d. The owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of forty acres of land situate in this state, upon which they reside; or the owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of any woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of real estate situate in this state, assessed for taxation at the value of three hundred dollars or more or the owner in good faith, in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith, in her own right, of personal property in this state assessed for taxation for three hundred dollars or more; provided, that the taxes due upon such real or personal property for the year next preceding the year in which he offers to register shall have been paid, unless the assessment shall have been legally contested and is undetermined.

Sec. 15. Any elector who registered prior to January 1, 1903, who has changed the county of his residence shall be registered on application on production of his certificate, unless he has since become disqualified.

Sec. 16. When the certificate of any elector who was duly registered has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, on application stating that the certificate has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, and verified by affidavit, and it appears of record that such applicant has been registered, the judge of probate of the county of registration or the secretary of state shall issue to the applicant a certificate that he was duly registered as an elector. Such certificate shall be issued free of charge to the elector. The secretary of state shall at the expense of the state furnish the judge of probate blank certificates for use as provided in this section.

The certificate of the registrars or the judge of probate or of the secretary of state shall be sufficient to establish the fact of such registration.

Be sure and register when the registrars are in your beat, as the only excuse for not doing so is by reason of sickness of yourself or in your family, or by absence from the county. Everybody can register this summer who will be qualified by residence or age by the 8th day of November. Poll tax paying has nothing to do with registration; you can register now and pay your poll tax afterwards, but you can not vote unless you are both registered and have paid your poll tax (if any is due). The period of residence necessary to register is two years in the state, one year in the county, and three months in the beat. If you have moved from one beat to another in the county less than three months before election day, you can vote in your old beat, so you don't lose your vote by changing beats. Any one who desires to register on property qualification should take with him his last assessment sheet and tax collector's receipt to show to the registrars as proof that you are possessed of such property, and pay taxes on it. You can register under ANY of the following heads:

1. If you own 40 acres or more land in this state, and reside upon it.

2. If your wife owns 40 acres or more land in this state, upon which you reside.

3. If you own real estate in this state that is assessed for taxation at $300 or more.

4. If your wife owns real estate in this state assessed for taxation at $300 or more.

5. If you own personal property in this state assessed for taxation for $300 or more.

6. If your wife owns personal property in this state assessed for taxation for $300 or more.

7. If you can read and write any section of the constitution of the United States.

Don't give up your life certificate that you got in 1902; you only have to show it to the registrars in case you have moved to this county from some other county.

THE UNION will furnish any one information on any special points that they may be in doubt upon, and stands ready to help any one to get all the rights he is entitled to under the laws of Alabama. If you think you are entitled to register and the registrars should refuse you, take a couple of good men with you so you can have witnesses as to such refusal and the reasons given by the registrars, and thereby be enabled to take your case up to higher authority. tf

Fortune Found in a Statuette.

Many old-fashioned French people are given to stowing away their pecuniary possessions in odd nooks and corners, often to the bewilderment of their heirs. A characteristic story comes from the environs of Paris, the heroine of the adventure being an old lady who expired a few months ago. She had put by a certain amount of money, which she bequeathed to two nephews. One of them waived his rights in favor of his brother, merely asking to be allowed to keep a little statuette as a souvenir of their departed relative. One day the servant of this self-denying individual happened to break the statuette, and to the amazement of its owner a lock of hair, a medallion, and last, not least, a number of one thousand franc bank notes dropped out from among the fragments. He retained these articles as some compensation for the smashed statuette without mentioning the affair to his brother, but having had occasion shortly afterward to dismiss his servant, she betook herself in hot haste to that gentleman, and related the whole incident. The owner of the statuette has been requested to hand over half the sum to his brother, and has been threatened with a lawsuit in the event of refusal.—London Telegraph.

A FOURTH OF JULY PICNIC.

To the picnic in the early morning
On the 4th of July, nineteen hundred and four,
All the lads and the lasses were roaming,
And hoped for a jolly good time galore.
The dinner was spread in the woodland,
On the grass by the rippling stream,
Across the way was the string band,
They wished to be heard and not seen.
The grandest of selections you'll say
The "Old folks at home,"
The place where they usually stay,
But to this picnic they should have come.
A vocal solo as never heard before,
The renditor we will not call;
But up with our best girl and be leaving
To be at the ice cream festival.
For there we will be treated
To music rich and grand,
And go early or we won't get seated,
And our best girl will have to stand.
If you like a jolly good time,
Something to drive away the blues,
You should on the 4th been in line,
And brought along your dancing shoes.
For some of our boys were on the floor.
Their names we will not call,
But this will say that I am sure
Their dancing excited all.
You asked the question, who were there?
So I will try and think,
And give the number about somewhere,
Were the ones that had a drink.
The first were Mr. and Mrs. Cobb,
Mr. Caddel, wife, and Mr. Odom;
Mr. Fleming, wife, and Mr. McCary,
Mr. Wright and wife and little Jerry.
Miss Emma Hubbard, with those eyes,
Casting look beyond the skies;
And Fannie said, what do you see?
Said she, Mr. Crayton is looking at me
Mollie was trying to look her best,
Mr. Rasberry thought of the girl out west:
So Oscar said I think it will be late
Before Miss Nix and I enter another state.
High sang, you are a little too small,
Sudie said, I'm not very tall;
Charley put his guitar aside and remarked,
When Hermie goes sparking the dogs will bark.
Luther said Miss Lizzie would lose her sheep,
For Will and John went hunting and wouldn't sleep;
Jim said, Miss Dulcie, give me your hand,
George and Selma were in another land.
Sam Fleming and Miss Rena Wright
Said they'd have a time at supper that night;
Miss Meda Cobb and Robert Kinkade
Had a nice chat under the shade.
I D. Wright is a gallant young man,
Especially when in charge of a girl's fan;
Clayton and Tom are up to date,
It's not a good idea to stay too late.
Miss Maggie Franklin, with winning ways,
May get Fraser before many days;
Miss Decia Champion's modest and shy,
To get her you'll have to be very sly.
The martins fly and soar above
Where Lizzie dwells and sings of love;
Mr. Veazey sang like a nightingale,
Miss Lillie was nervous and somewhat pale.
Bayard, Clint, Joe and Ernest
Looked for one who was not present;
Some looked round, saying with grace,
For a picnic this is just the place.
Some gents came, but went away,
They'll regret it some future day;
Names were Grover, Robert and Bert,
From appearances they like to flirt.
Messrs. Veazey and Wright wouldn't remain,
And keep from crying I couldn't refrain;
Monroe and Percy, last to be mentioned,
But they were prominent at the convention.
Our picnic is over of July, nineteen four,
And again we fall into line;
With feelings of joy and faces aglow
We homeward go, to meet some future time.

Editor Union:

I wish to say through THE UNION that many of the things that are said in the paper and otherwise about my speaking appointments are untrue. I've met good large crowds at more than half the places. I have highly pleased all my hearers, and they have many been elated over my speeches and pronounce themselves of the opinion that I am fully right in my stand against the caucus and trade ticket. Nearly everywhere they have called for an explanation of the caucus scheme and many have said they wished me to keep fighting it. F. O. DUDLEY HAS FULLY PRONOUNCED AGAINST IT, AND THOUGH HE SIGNED THE PAPER AGREEING WITH TEN OTHERS (all told) TO SUPPORT MR. REYNOLDS, etc., HE HAS WASHED HIS HANDS OF THE WHOLE THING, AND IS NOT GOING TO SUSTAIN HIM. HE WILL NOT VOTE FOR REYNOLDS IN THE PRIMARY NOR IN NOVEMBER should Reynolds be nominated. Now, gentlemen, do not harp on Jennings' crowds, because Jennings learns that you have been so low as one man and a boy to 17 candidates and as high as 27 candidates to three men, so you have not come out so well by far as I have. I have had some audiences of 120 to 150 or more, and I've had an average of 20 to 25 I should say, and the best of all they are highly entertained and go away to work for Jennings. Ah! gentlemen, people can't all be fooled, all the time. They know the best man for leader this time to win on from July 26th to November 8th, inclusive, and they know that man is your friend Jennings. And regardless of your efforts to belie him and to throttle public opinion, they will vote for that man that is most competent and who has the best running advantages, and they know that is Jennings. So, look out for Jennings! He is now heavily in the lead and will be on July 26th and again on the 8th day of November. And when he is seated, every one in Chilton, regardless of party, will have ONE competent and just official to all classes alike. Sinceerly yours,

S. J. JENNINGS,
Candidate for Probate Judge.

Clanton, Ala., July 19, 1904.

To the Voters and Taxpayers of Chilton County:

As my work has been such that I could not possibly get round to see you, I write to explain my reasons for withdrawing my announcement for the office of probate judge and announcing for re-election to the office of tax assessor. So far as getting the nomination for that office, I feel sure that my chances were as good as any one of the four that were running, but having given the matter very careful consideration I considered my services due the people who have elected me until August, 1905, as they elected me for four years, and then the legislature extended the term one year, which would make my present term continue to August, 1905, and I want to say just here that you will find me with the people who elected me to office to serve them to the last day under any circumstances, and I found so many of my friends after I had announced for probate judge wishing I had continued for the office of tax assessor and asking me to withdraw and make my announcement for tax assessor, I finally decided to do so, as I am willing to serve the people wherever thy wish me to. Of course, as I have said before, the people all know me and I don't think it is necessary for me to see them or electioneer with them. They can judge the future by the past, as I have served them eight years as tax assessor. I have made every convenience for them that I could and done everything that I could to save them from paying fees, and if they see proper to elect me again, why there is no one that would appreciate it more than myself, and I will serve the people to the very best of my ability, as in the past. And now again thanking the people for past support and kindness to me while discharging the duties of my office and kindly asking your support again, I am yours, very sincerely,

A. C. MIMS.

The time for holding our primary is near at hand and I will say to my friends that I have visited nearly every part of the county and am very favorably impressed with my prospects. I believe that in the primary I will be nominated by a handsome majority. We should be very considerate in the selection of our ticket and vote for the best men for every position, men well qualified to discharge their respective duties, for upon that depends the election of our ticket and the building up and perpetuating the party. I believe that now the life of our party hangs in the balance, and it now remains with you and depends upon how you vote this time whether you do or do not deal the populist-republican party the hardest blow it has ever had in Chilton county, being one of the founders of the party in this state, I have labored to build it up, and have made many sacrifices. In regard to the trade ticket so much spoken of it seems direct evidence is wanting, but the circumstantial evidence is very strong—so strong as to satisfy your mind beyond a reasonable doubt that there is a combination with certain candidates and the black and tan element of the republican party, and the candidate if satisfied in his mind that such is the case should vote against the entire combination.

All the voters of both the republican and populist parties who believe that the county politics could be advanced by such proceedure (when there are only three negroes in the county that can vote) have certainly never stopped to think. Think before you vote. Look well to the west.

In conclusion I now leave my candidacy in your hands, being fully assured you will do your duty as you see it. With best wishes to you all, I am yours, very respectfully,

ALEX G. DAKE.

Editor Union—Please allow me space in your paper to correct some reports that have been told in some parts of this county. It has been told that I tried to keep Mr. Hubbard from coming out, and that I was working against him; this is NOT TRUE. I think the people all know him and his record can't be beat. He is the same man now as when he was first elected. It ain't made no change in him, so I don't think we could beat him. He has been tried and never denied, so let us all turn out on the 26th and vote for him and a good ticket with him and carry them out to a glorious victory on November 8th. Yours truly,

ALEX GLASSCOCK.

Editor Union:

Will you allow me to say through the columns of your valuable paper to my friends and the voters of Chilton county that the report which I learn is being talked in some parts of this county that I have withdrawn from the race for the office of tax collector is NOT TRUE? I've not withdrawn from the race and will not until the end. I'm not canvassing the county nor going the rounds with the other candidates speech-making, because I don't think it necessary. For this reason I am sufficiently known to the people of this county for them to decide as to whether they want me to collect the taxes for another term or not, and I am perfectly willing to submit the matter to the people without argument and will be satisfied with their decision. I promise that if elected I will do all in my power to discharge the duties of the office according to law and without partiality, and if not elected I will submit cheerfully to the will of the people and continue to be truly thankful for the honors and the confidence shown to me in the past and will remain one of the boys. Respectfully,

T. J. HUBBARD.

Editor Union:

It has come to my knowledge that some people are saying that the announcement of Mr. T. J. Hubbard for re-election as tax collector by several gentlemen, including myself, was solicited by him, and that he had to coax some of us to do it. Now, I want to say that this is not true. I, as well as the others who are on that card, got it up ourselves and for these reasons, that Mr. Hubbard had made Chilton county a good officer and done his duty in every respect, and we thought it for the best interests of our county to retain a good officer. If the people nominate Mr. Hubbard to succeed himself he will run at the head of the ticket, for the democrats can not truthfully say anything against him, either as to character, competency, efficiency or anything else; while they might allege that some of his opponents (if they were nominated) were not as well fitted for the office as they ought to be. Yours respectfully,

R. J. WILLIAMS.

PLEASANT GROVE.

On last Friday evening the young people of Pleasant Grove were invited to the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Caddell, where they assembled and enjoyed themselves immensely. In the parlor, nicely draped and beautifully decorated with lovely flowers which filled the air with their sweet odor, the young ladies, sweet and pretty as could be, and young men bright and happy, chatted nicely, pleasantly and quietly to each other's delight until the call came for supper, when they were shown into the table by the hostess, Mrs. J. A. Caddell. The table was beautifully adorned with sweet flowers and pretty mosses. A most adorable scene it was to the eye. However, flowers and mosses were not all there was to be seen, as ice cream and cake were served to the satisfaction of all present. A nicer supper has never been, as there was a good crowd and all seemed to enjoy themselves and with the best behavior.

Editor Union:

It is but a few days until the people make choice of the men that are to fill their ticket. We hope to have a ticket of men that the opposite party or no one else can successfully question. We think we have such men in the race and we believe they will be nominated. We've men that have done themselves honor by the honorable and upright manner that they have served their county. Such men are L. H. Reynolds and T. J. Hubbard. Mr. Reynolds has served his county as their representative for three terms, and he has ever shown himself ready and willing to spare no pains and effort to serve his constituents to their best interests on all occasions. He has been with the people in their battles and has ever been found in the front rank amid the thickest of the fight. He has ever stood by the people, as his work in the legislature will prove, and is a competent and suitable man to fill the office of probate judge. So cast your vote for Reynolds on the 26th and then again in November, and when he has served the people as honorably in that office as in others the people will ever feel proud of such an efficient man for that place and cherish with fond memory the good times when Reynolds was judge of probate.

In Mr. Hubbard we also have a man that none can question. His work for the two terms that he has held the office of tax collector stands out before the people and reflects great honor and credit on Mr. Hubbard and the county. Some say two terms of an office is enough for one man, but if I have a horse that suits me and does my work well, why swap it for another? Mr. Hubbard has been kind and courteous to the people, doing them many acts of favor at his expense, for which he received no compensation. Not a county in the state has a more beloved, accommodating and efficient tax collector than Mr. Hubbard. He is always one of the first in the state to make his settlement with the auditor. He has filled the office to the satisfaction of all parties, so come on the 26th and vote for Reynolds and Hubbard. The chances are that the insurance companies will drop the tax collector's bonds from their list, and if such be the case Mr. Hubbard will have no trouble to make his bond in the county. Mr. Hubbard has submitted this matter to the people and is laying still for them to decide it. "The still sow drinks the swill," and when the 26th comes he will get his share, and a large one it will be. Come out and put in your vote for Reynolds and Hubbard. They are good and competent men that will help as much as any two to make a good ticket. Come and vote for them and you will have good officers. Success to them and THE UNION.

REYNOLDS CALLS DOWN THE LIARS.

Below is a copy of a letter sent to the Banner by Hon. L. H. Reynolds. It speaks very plainly for itself:

Jemison, Ala., July 16, 1904.

Mr. Frank Crichton, Ed. Banner,
Clanton, Ala.

Dear Sir: My attention has been called to an article in your paper last week signed T. J. Mims, purporting to explain a land transaction between him and myself. He says I made him think I was giving him a good title, but after it was too late he found it was a quit claim deed, and that he lost $160. Now, the whole statement is false. In the first place, I sold this land to his father, and he fully understood the whole transaction. By referring to the record in the probate office, vol. 48, page 26, you will see the deed only shows $40, and I gave him four years to pay it in, and you will see further that it was acknowledged before Mr. Sam Arledge, J. P. Now he and his father would not trust a justice here, but sent Mr. Arledge. Did anybody ever hear of Mr. Arledge being fooled in a deed? Now he says he has repeatedly asked me to pay him his money back. This is false. He did come to me about two years ago, and said Mr. A. C. Smith told him I could get the original money I had paid for this back, as it was not subject to taxes. So I met him in Mr. Smith's omce, but after investigating Mr. Smith said he had waited too long, but he never said one word about being fooled, nor did he ask me to pay him any money back. Any one interested can ask Mr. Smith about the transaction in his office. But on July 7th I got the following letter from Mr. T. J. Mims, which explains the whole matter. Read it for yourself:

Clanton, Ala., July 7, 1904.

Hon. L. H. Reynolds,
Jemison, Ala.

Dear Sir: I have in the past always supported you, both in primary and general elections, but under present conditions and on account of past business transaction, I can not do so this time, unless you make satisfaction with me in regard to that public land which you sold me. If you do not make satisfaction by return mail I shall expose you to the people of Chilton county, and shall use my influence against you in every instance which I can. Yours, etc.,

T. J. MIMS.

The above is an exact copy of his letter, and every one knows it is against the law to use mails to try to scare money out of any one, and more than that, he indirectly tries to impress me if I will pay him some money he will vote for me; if not, he will vote against me. I do not indorse such methods as these in politics. Neither do I believe the honest democrats indorse them. I am sure if I have got to do such as this to get an office, I will never get one. I defy anybody to show where any of my friends ever started such a report on my opponents. I think when people try to drag one's business into politics they have about exhausted everything else; but if that is the issue this campaign is to be fought out on, I am willing to meet my opponents on it. In conclusion I will say if I get as good a vote in other parts of the county as I will among my customers (and those I have sold goods to for the last eleven years) I will have no trouble in being elected. I did hope this election would be fought out on high grounds, and there would be no mud slinging, and I can not see what business a democratic paper has in meddling in a populist primary. I hope you will publish this, Mr. Crichton, as it refers to my business. Send me the bill and I will send you check for the same. Respectfully,

L. H. REYNOLDS.

BALLAD OF DOUBT.

Forever a-dream and adrift with doubt—the peace of the past forgot:
And "He loves thee, heart—he loves thee;" and "Heart, he loves thee not;"
The exquisite pain that is sweetly vain—that leaps at a touch, a sound;
And "He loves thee not, dear heart," she saith, with the arms of love around!

Forever a-dream and adrift with doubt! She is there, at the garden gate,
And she weeps good-bye 'neath a fancied sky that burns with the stars of fate!
And he whispers: 'Dear, I love thee. Be the pain and the grief forgot."
But she heareth only an echo that answers: "He loves thee not!"

Oh, tyrant-love that tortures a life with thorns and fears—
Her beautiful eyes contending forever with smiles and tears!
He hath given her life's sweet roses—the lilies shall be her lot;
But she winnows the thorn from the rose-leaf and weeps that he loves her not!

And so they twain go sighing—sighing the world along,
Where faith is a flower undying and love is a deathless song!
The exquisite pa in that is sweetly vain still throbs at a touch—a sound;
And "He loves thee not, dear heart," she saith, with the arms of love around!

—Frank L. Stanton, in the Atlanta Constitution.

A Lazy Lover.

By Hattie Whitney.

THEY were out on the lake, Roy Adams and Ruby Lane, paddling about among the water lilies. He had just come as near proposing to her, and she to refusing him, as it was possible to do and miss, this being their customary daily diversion. Now he was watching her lazily. That was what irritated her so—his inordinate laziness.

He was large and blond, with placid blue eyes like a sleepy baby's. She was little and trim as waxwork, and her gray eyes were clear and keen. The exciting point of the day's program over, Roy had settled down to his usual comfortable nonchalance.

"I don't know what kind of a fellow you want," he grumbled, amiably, with an indolent movement of one oar, and somehow his laziest motion seemed to accomplish a good deal.

"I know," said Ruby, positively.

"Let's hear about him," Roy proposed.

"He's brisk," Ruby replied, "and energetic."

"Think I've got him in my mind's eye." Roy gave the other oar an easy touch. "Small and bustling—and chippery, like the little cock sparrow who sat on a tree."

"He isn't like that in the least," Ruby sat up prim and stiff, and rosy with indignation.

"Oh, isn't he? Beg his pardon. Where is he now?"

"At work," Ruby replied, promptly, her tone implying a comparison between a man thus profitably employed and one who idled his time away at a summer hotel.

"Perhaps he has an object in view," Roy insinuated.

"Perhaps," Ruby admitted, demurely.

"And—um—is the object to be attained soon?"

Ruby let her eyes droop toward the top ruffle of her blue organdie.

"I—don't know exactly; not before next spring." She was dabbling her hand in the lake, her eyelashes still slanting downward.

"Ah! Congratulate him, and everything. Shall we row over to that bunch of willows, or down to the little cove?"

For an instant Ruby wished she might tip the boat over, just to see if his exasperating equanimity would be disturbed even by such an emergency.

"I don't believe it would," she decided, in disgust. "He'd get us out if he could conveniently, and if he could not he'd drown with that contented smile on his face, as serenely as if he were a wooden Shem out of a toy Noah's ark."

* * * * * * *

Mrs. Albert Loyd was peacefully crocheting a pair of bedroom slippers for Mr. Albert Loyd, chanting such incantation as: "Chain two; double in second double; turn; five singles in loop; chain two," when her sister Ruby whirled in upon her, cast herself into a rocking chair, and rocked tempestuously for three minutes. Mrs. Albert viewed her quietly, suspending her crochet hook for a moment.

"Three singles in loop; chain two—been fencing with Mr. Adams again?" she queried, mildly.

"Yes," Ruby answered, "but I hardly think he'll care about fencing any more."

"No? Why not? Turn; five singles."

"I practically told him I was—engaged."

"Dear me! chain five—and to whom? Turn."

"A person I invented."

"You unprincipled little wretch! What did you do it for?"

"Just to see what effect it would have."

"Two singles—and what effect did it?"

"None at all. You couldn't stir him up to move an eyelash, whatever you did; he's too sublimely lazy even to lose his temper."

Mrs. Albert shook her head gently.

"You're off the track," she commented, unwinding more scarlet wool; "he may perhaps be guilty of always keeping his temper, and, let me tell you, a married woman would consider that a very good failing, but as for being lazy—Albert's friend, that little Mr. Higginson, who knows him well, says he works in his office like a galley slave ten months of the year, and although he has that lazy way and looks as if he were letting things go to smash if they want to, he has his eye on everything, and every move he makes counts. I shouldn't wonder if you've put your silly foot in it for once with your invented man. Albert says there isn't a more whole-souled fellow living than Roy Adams, but just because he doesn't hop around and fuss over everything like a banty chicken—as you do—you must get scornful and snub him. You've done it all summer, you know you have, and he's been as faithful to you as the needle to the haystack, or whatever it is a needle is supposed to be faithful to. You always were a fractious child, and you aren't a whit better now than when you were six years——" Mrs. Loyd ceased her lecture as she found herself talking to a dissolving view of blue organdie ruffles and a couple of whisking sash ends, and returned to her chaining, doubling and looping.

Roy appeared before Ruby early the next day in his usual calm frame of mind and his boating rig.

"Think he'll object to your going out on the lake with me just once more?" he asked. "I'm going away early tomorrow morning."

"What for?" she asked.

"Have to," he responded; "vacation comes to an end to-night. Can you go?"

She ran out and slipped her boating hat on in silence. She was reflecting dismally that she must either confess her little romance of yesterday an unfounded one, or bid good-bye forever to this exasperating man, and she knew now that the latter was something she could not do and retain any shred of happiness. She waited, however, until they were out on the blue, soothing bosom of the lake. Then she rushed into it.

"He couldn't object, you know," she said, reverting to his remark of some time before, "because he's only fiction."

"A dream-man?" he asked. She nodded, blushing uncomfortably.

He hummed a bar of "When a Dream Came True," and settled back easily. Ruby looked down in silence. She was waiting for him to say something else—and he was carelessly moving an oar now and then, and apparently thinking of nothing at all. She noticed for the first time how strong his brown hands looked; they were not the hands of a lazy man.

They drifted along aimlessly.

"It was a silly story to tell," Ruby said, at last.

"Oh, I don't know," he answered, indulgently. "I rather thought you were fabricating. But you might realize him yet, you know."

"I don't want to." Her voice was a little uneven.

"Poor dream-man; sympathize with him, I'm sure. Like to have that pond lily?"

"Thank you, I don't care for it; let's go back."

He agreed amiably. "I ought to get back early," he said. "I promised Kingsland to come over and go fishing this afternoon, so we may not see each other again. Caesar, isn't this a day for fishing, though!"

Ruby's cheeks tingled as she walked silently beside him through the light, dry grass on the way to the hotel, while he stalked cheerfully along, making irritatingly pleasant remarks about the scenery.

They came to a standstill at the summer house on the lawn. It was empty, and Ruby did not want to walk into the crowd of people on the hotel porch.

"I'm tired," she said; "I'll rest a while, and we can say good-bye here."

He held out his sunburned hand and clasped hers closely for a minute. "Good-bye," he said. "If you should come to terms with the dream-man, don't forget to let me know."

She watched him going across an adjoining field, as she fell into the big willow chair and began to rock. Then she looked off dismally toward the misty hills. They were dimmer than the light summer haze warranted.

"Only a summer flirtation—only a summer flirtation," creaked the chair, maddeningly.

She turned her eyes to the field again. She could still see the tall form loitering along. When it should disappear, the end of things would have come. He stooped, seeming to pick up something; then he turned slowly and began his easy stride back toward the summer house. It seemed ages before he reached the door and looked in, holding toward her a flower on a stalk, just a fringe of pale lilac petals uncurling from a tawny golden centre.

"See, I found the first aster, and came back to bring it to you," he said.

She accepted it silently. He looked curiously at her eyes. The rims were decidedly pink. He folded his arms and leaned against the door casing.

"Sure you aren't going to marry the dream-man?" he asked, after a casual survey of the landscape.

"Didn't I tell you there wasn't any?"

"I thought you might be fibbing again. If there really isn't——"

"Well?"

"Couldn't you reconsider things and take me, after all?"—New York News.

LONGEST WORD IN THE WORLD.

Used by Aristophanes in a Comedy, and Has 177 Letters.

"What is the longest word in the world? I am not rash enough to attempt to answer that question," said a well-known author to the Boston Journal. "There is a certain Welsh name of a place which reaches me every now and then, and which I have printed more than once, which is sufficiently formidable. I believe that the patient and serious Germans have turned out some verbal monsters, and it may be that the Chinese, the Russians and others with whose literature I am unacquainted have produced series of linked letters, long drawn out, which are called words. So I carefully abstain from saying which is the longest word in the world.

"But I think I may venture to suggest that there are not many words longer than one which may be found in Liddell and Scott's Greek lexicon. Here is the modest trifle:

"Lepadotemachoselachogaleokraniolipiplanodrimupotrimmatsilphioparaomelitokatakechumenokichlepikossuphophattoperisteralektruonoptegkphalokigokkolopeleoiolagooisiraiobaletraganopterugon.

"I hope I have copied it correctly, but there may be a slip here and there, and life is not long enough to write it out twice, and the good printer, in whom I have the utmost confidence, may be excused if he stumbles now and then. In English it ought to have 177 letters—there or thereabout.

"In its original Greek form it would not be quite so numerous, as 'ch,' 'ps,' and 'ph' are represented by one letter. The word is used by Aristophanes, who was a comedian, and who, therefore, must have his little joke, and some of his little jokes, by the way, are not quite nice. As to its meaning, the learned lexicographers state that it is 'the name of a dish compounded of all kinds of dainties, fish, flesh, fowl and sauces.'

"It would look well on a menu, and I should like well to hear a badgered waiter trying to shout it down a long-suffering tube or a gentleman who has already dined fairly well bawling it out toward the end of the banquet."

Bathing in the Dead Sea.

"I have bathed in the Dead Sea and in Great Salt Lake," said a wealthy reporter, "and the strangest, oddest thing about each bath was the toweling that followed it.

"Do you want to know exactly what it is like to towel yourself after a swim in the lake or the sea? If you do, cover yourself all over with butter and then with a dozen towels try to rub yourself dry and clean.

"That will be an impossible thing to do, but hardly more impossible than to rub off the sea's or lake's thick brine. Really, though, it is an oil rather than a brine. After a bath in it you might towel and rub till you were raw, but your flesh would still remain slippery and clammy.

"Swimming in these strange waters is pleasant enough. In the Dead Sea I found that I could swim with my body out of water to the waist. You float like a cork, even though you don't move a muscle.

"Hence you would think no deaths from drowning ever happened there. Such deaths do happen, though. Dead Sea navigators, when their boats capsize, get entangled in the rigging. They perish in that way."

Big Things Found in Alaska.

Alaska is a big country and it has big possibilities. It has the biggest bear, the biggest moose, the biggest mountain sheep and the biggest salmon and grayling in the world. All of these are plentiful and can be taken under United States regulations.

Time was when Alaska and Siberia were thought of by many as synonymous, and without an idea of just what was meant by either name. That has all changed in the last few years, and now Alaska is not so very far away from Seattle. Moreover, it has been found to be anything but an inhabited and unihabitable country. It is without doubt the greatest game country on the globe to-day, because it is the newest, and the conditions are right for the maintenance of game animals and birds.

The biggest mountain on the Northern American Continent is in Alaska and is well named Mount McKinley.—Field and Stream.

How Bookseller Gives Away Koran.

A writer spent much of his early life in Turkey observed that Turkish books and booksellers were among the curious features of the country. "The Turkish bookseller," he said, "has a soul above trade. He rarely or never attempts to push his wares, and treasures some of his more valuable books so greatly that he can hardly be induced to sell them, although they form part of his stock in trade. Many of the books displayed by the bookseller are in manuscript, which the old-fashioned Turks esteem more highly than print. The Koran he may not sell. He gives it away—in return for a present of its value in money."—London Globe.

His Substitute.

Quite a touching story comes from Crefeld. A student of that city was summoned before a Magistrate on Monday for brawling. He happened to be reading for an examination, and found he had no time to attend. So he sent his fiancee instead, in a suit of male clothes. Unfortunately, the astute authorities were not taken in. The lady is now working out a sentence of one month for "Justizrathsperson enbeleidigung."

How to Listen to Music

By ARLIE BRADLEY.

There are many subjects under music which we all are to a certain extent familiar with, as the "biographers of its masters," "the development," or "mediaeval music;" but not many give the subject of "how to listen to music" much thought. Maybe because it does not seem as though this is one of any great importance, taking it for granted that "to listen, is to hear." However, the proper capacity to listen to music is better proof of musical talent than skill to play upon any instrument or to sing acceptably. It does more for that gentleness and refinement of thought and action, which it is the province of music to promote. Of all the arts, music is practiced most and thought about least. One reason is, that a sweet mystery enshrouds the nature of music, and that to master it technically alone costs a vast amount of time, patience and industry.

Music is dual in its nature; it is material as well as spiritual. The material side we apprehend through hearing, comprehend through intelligence; but the spiritual side we reach by fancy and imagination. A true musician will recognize in every selection the three decisive elements of music—harmony, melody and rhythm. Simply explained, harmony is a well ordered series of tones; melody, the ordered tone of series, and rhythm, the symmetrical grouping of the series. Beyond doubt, melody is the most important of the three. The master is the one who has the genius to put fire, passion, poetry and expression into his compositions—to make them seem living things. Of all those who have been able to do this, Beethoven has led. Like Goethe, this genius has secreted many a mystery in his masterpieces, but divine talent shows itself in every tone, and the secret only charms.

To listen to music, to appreciate it, we must first know something of its divisions. Of these, there may be said to be four; chamber, programme, classic and romantic. The first section represents pure thought, lofty imagination and deep learning. Composers find it the finest field for the display of their talents, because their own skill in creating is to be paired with the trained skill in hearing. Properly speaking, the programme music is applied to descriptions, emotions and poetic inspirations; and in a high sense this class is the purest music in the world. Schumann, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Liszt were lovers of the programme. But, among all terms in music, are words of no vaguer meaning than classic and romantic, although all have a general idea of each. Summed up very briefly, we may say that the classic is that style of music strictly adhering to all the established rules of harmony and counterpoint, regardless of poetry or expression of tone, and that the romantic is merely the progressive and creative principle of the classic style.

As the highest type of instrumental music, we have the symphony, a term taken from the Greek (symphonia). This, if it be written for a solo instrument, becomes a sonata, or if written for an orchestra, a concerto. The symphony is made up of four parts: (1) the allegro, a quick movement, which may be preceded by an introduction or prelude, (2) the adagio, a slow movement, (3) the scherzo, a playful, jocose movement, (4) the finale, usually called the rondo, which repeats the chosen theme several times, and which may be introduced by a trio. Another interesting form of older instrumental music is the serenade, which is simply a group of short pieces, arranged agreeably. This style belongs to the "days of chivalry," when gallant knights serenaded their fair ladies. This form of composition was followed by the Gigue, the Minuet and the Gavotte. With the old masters, as Bach, Beethoven and Chopin, came into existence the prelude, etude, nocturne and the symphony. Later, another style of composition became famous, known as Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies. These works will always live, on account of their weird, dreamy and romantic construction, as well as the technic and skill required in their execution.

A few short years and grand opera reached a state of perfection, through the wonderful genius of Gounod, Mozart, Verdi and Meyerbeer. Who has not heard of Gounod's "Faust," Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and "Don Giovanni," Verdi's "Il Trovatore" and Meyerbeer's "Huguenots" and "The Prophet?" These grand works will never perish; they are too great. In choral music, the names Bach, Handel and Haydn stand first. What could be more beautiful than "The Messiah," "The Creation" and "The Passion-Music?"

Surely the poet who said "music is the gift of heaven" was correct, for what art is so pure, so true, or so magnificent and sublime as music? What can be as beautiful as its masterpieces when performed perfectly? Yes, surely music is divine, for it is the highest of all things.

Great Turtle.

When Mauritius was ceded to Great Britain in 1810 there was a gigantic turtle in the court at the artillery barracks at Port Louis which is still there, although almost blind. It weighs 330 pounds and stands two feet high when walking. Its shell is eight and one-half feet long, and it can carry two men on its back with ease.

A TRAGEDY OF THE SLUMS.

REMARKABLE STORY ABOUT A GANG OF LONDON THIEVES.

Hero Born in a Workhouse Is Finally Adopted by a Benefactor—Made Sole Heir to Fortune—Full Confession of a Plotter Ends Mystery.

The New York Globe reprints the following "special to the Globe" under the date line "London, June 22, 1838:"

Through a sensational slum murder and the revelation by it of a gang of thieves and cut-throats, Scotland Yard has unearthed a most interesting romance and incidently restored to his fortune a young boy, who, despite his few years, has gone through more than ordinarily comes to men in the full course of their lives. A quarter of a century ago society was greatly interested in the marriage of the late Edwin Leeford, then a young man in his teens, with a lady of high position several years his senior. The marriage, which had as its issue one son, did not turn out happily, and in a few years Mrs. Leeford, taking her son, went to the continent to live.

Some time later intimate friends of the family were greatly troubled over reports of a liason between Mr. Leeford and an estimable young woman, the daughter of a retired officer. Then a relative died, leaving Mr. Leeford his fortune. Mr. Leeford went to Rome to settle the estate and died while there, without leaving, so far as then known, a will. The whereabouts of the unfortunate young woman became a mystery, for she left her father's roof and was supposed to have made away with herself. Now, however, it is known that she died in a county workhouse after having given birth to a son, who has come to be the hero of this latest causes celebe, and is to enjoy what is left of his half of the estate left by his unfortunate father, whose will, it turns out, was destroyed shortly after his death by his wife.

Last week, it will be remembered, Spitalfields was greatly excited by the murder of a notorious woman named Sikes. The murderer was her lover, known as "Bill," who a few days later, was killed while attempting to elude pursuit. The crime was a direct outcome of the romance to which reference has been made.

According to the police, the boy when he left the workhouse fell into the hands of a gang of thieves which has existed for several years in the east end, under the leadership of one Fagin. Their efforts to make a thief out of him failed, but it ultimately put him in the way of coming into his own. He was arrested on a charge of pocket picking preferred by Mr. Brownlow, a gentleman of means, and discharged for lack of sumcient evidence. Mr. Brownlow became interested in the boy and took him home, but a few days later members of the gang, the murdered woman and her brother kidnapped him for fear that he would tell what he knew to the police. Later he was taken by the murderer and another thief to help them in robbing the house of Mrs. Maylie and in the melee that followed the boy was, badly hurt. Again he fell into the hands of the police, but this time Mrs. Maylie came to his rescue and provided him with a home.

In the meantime, it seems, his half-brother, Edward Leeford, had become cognizant of his existence, and conscious of the fact that the boy was heir to half his father's property, undertook to destroy all proof of his identity. Leeford is a bad character, and, under the name of "Monks," has consorted with thieves more or less, including Fagin. He decided, therefore, to have Fagin get hold of the boy and keep him, for he himself had secured and destroyed some little mementoes that had been taken from the boy's unfortunate mother by her nurse.

In the gang of disreputable characters into which the boy had fallen he had found one friend, the Sikes woman. She undertook to warn Miss Rose Maylie, Mrs. Maylie's niece, of the conspiracy against the boy, and succeeded in her effort, but Fagin, suspecting her, had her shadowed, and then told her brother that she had betrayed him to the police. This was the cause of the murder.

The developments from then on were very rapid. Mr. Brownlow, the first protector of the boy, turned out to be the closest friend of his father and one who for years had been trying to find traces of him. When he first had the boy he suspected that he was Edward Leeford's son, because of his striking resemblance to a portrait of his mother. Mr. Brownlow succeeded after much difficulty in getting hold of Edward Leeford, alias Monks, and secured a full confession from him, how his mother had destroyed the will, how he himself had followed the boy up and sought to get rid of him without resorting to murder, and how he had plotted to have Fagin kidnap him again. Moreover, he gave the interesting news that Miss Rose Maylie is the boy's aunt. It seems that his father, overwhelmed with sorrow and shame at the fate of his elder daughter, retired to the country and changed his name. At his death his daughter, Rose was adopted by Mrs. Maylie, whom she has always regarded as her aunt.

With the death of Sikes and his sister, the arrest and certain conviction of Fagin, the gang of pickpockets and thieves has been fairly well broken up. John Dawkins, alias the "artful Dodger;" Charles Bates, and Toby Crackit, other members of the gang are also in custody. The hero's romance will henceforth be [illegible] Oliver Brownlow, having been [illegible] ed by his benefactor, and he will forget his workhouse name of Twist. It is learned from the [illegible] ltors of the family that little [illegible] of his father's fortune, a matter [illegible] £6,000, but Mr. Brownlow is well [illegible] and has made his his sole heir.

A CORRECTION.

The printer made a mistake last week and took L. H. Reynold's announcement out of the probate judge list, instead of A. C. Mims'. It has been rectified this week, and Mr. Reynold's card is there so all can see it and make sure that Reynolds is still in the race with no thought of such a thing as defeat.

S. J. JENNINGS.

Mr. Jennings must be posing as a missionary to the democrats, for his speaking on Thursday night in the courthouse was attended by none but democrats. In looking over the audience of about sixty we could not see one republican or populist present. Inside the railing it looked like a meeting of the democratic club. In the course of his disconnected harangue he spoke of the present postmaster of Clanton, F. O. Dudley, who was present, as being his true friend and sticking by him so loyally, and democrats present spoke up and said: "Of course he's all right; he's a democrat." Well we always thought he was, and now they claim him, so they can have him. The more of these "plated republicans" we get rid of the better off we shall be. "Put none but the old guard on duty."

Just a few lines from here, where Just a few lines from here. When I was at Coopers last I heard some of our people say that Ben H. Wells was not competent to fill the office of tax collector, and that he was a prejudiced man. Now, I want to say that I've known Bro. Wells for over 20 years; was in the Farmers' Alliance with him when it was first organized in Chilton county. I know that he always contends for his rights, and if that is prejudice, I say keep on with prejudice. Mr. Wells is a self-made man and makes his living by the sweat of his face, and I indorse just such men as that for office. He is a man that won't be run over by democratic laws that are bought with money, and the same snake bit me, and if it had not been for Wells and myself and a few others there would be stock law in beats 5 and 10 today. Editor Union:

As I am just about to get straight again I will put in a few words to THE UNION. I've been down with the fever, but am able to spell politics again and wish to say a few words in the interest of Rev. J. H. Thomas, our candidate for tax collector. I think Bro. Thomas is about the only candidate in the field that I haven't heard a word said against. I've heard several say he is a gentleman and competent to fill the office which he seeks. I hope to see Brothers Thomas and Milling collect and assess the taxes of Chilton county.

I think they are both straight gentlemen. From what I can learn of Bro. Thomas leads me to believe that he is one and from what I know of T. G. Milling makes me think he is also. So hurrah, boys, some of you haven't got much fight to make, but just keep in good spirits. The 26th is drawing nigh. Good wishes to THE UNION and its readers.

Beat 4, July 16, 1904.

Now that the time is fast approaching for the holding of our primary election, it behooves every good citizen who intends to vote in the primary to ask himself whether he is prepared to cast his ballot intelligently, and to discharge this duty for the best interests of the whole people of the county. First, none but good men, honest men, faithful men, true men, ought to be given our suffrages and elected to office. It is generally agreed that the most important office to be filled in Chilton county is that of judge of probate. More largely than in the case of any other office is the keeping of interests of the people in the hands, the conscience and honesty of the judge of probate. Our people ought not to forget that the estates, the property of those dying in our county and to be administered upon by the probate judge, that to this court alone our widows and orphans may look. How important it is, then, that the judge of probate to be chosen is a person who is competent to fill the place, and scarcely less important, honest, straightforward and free from suspicion. Let us ask ourselves whether these, the best of qualifications, are not possessed by Alex G. Dake, and if we believe as everybody who knows him believes, he would fill the measure, why, then, let's vote for him. In his hands justice would be administered, the public interests would be safe-guarded, the estates of widows and orphans would be secure, and in his selection the people would honor themselves in honoring him.

Mr. Kilgore Explains."

"Clanton, May 27, 1902.

"Editor Banner: Please allow me space in your columns to speak a few words to the public in regard to my resignation as sheriff of Chilton county. I want to say, first, that I thank my friends from the very depths of my heart for their support and for all that they have done for me. I want to say, too, that I was in a quandary some time before I made up my mind to resign. I would have resigned six or eight months ago if it had not been for going back on my friends. Now a word to them: Gentlemen, I know you will give me hall Columbia, but I hope you will be as lenient with me as possible, for there is no one hates it worse than I hated to do it. I want to say that my principles have not changed at all—I am the same old Moses as ever, and will be until death. I trust and believe that you have a good and conservative man in my place, so I will close by thanking all those who have done me any favors during my term of office. I remain yours, as ever,

VOTE FOR DAKE.

(Communicated.)
Clanton, July 18, 1904.

To the People of Chilton County:

We, the undersigned, having learned that a report is being circulated that a trade ticket had been made up at a certain meeting held in Clanton about the middle of April. Now we, whose names are signed to this instrument, were present at said meeting, but no candidate was mentioned or suggested. We were trying to agree on some plan to have but one ticket in the field against organized democracy, and the leading republicans did agree to go in the July primary and support the nominees, which was one of the best acts that has been done politically for our party. Now we realize such reports as these are circulated by enemies and not our friends, and only for the purpose of stirring up prejudice. Respectfully,

J. Bice, J. F. Goodgame, W. H. Goodgame, L. H. Reynolds, W. A. Reynolds

VOTE FOR DAKE FOR PROBATE JUDGE

(Communicated.)
Jemison, Ala., July 18, 1904.

Editor Union: I ask for a small space in your paper this week. Our primary will soon be here and I hope our canvass will continue as nice and pleasant as it has been up to now. I could not be out in the canvass very much on account of business, and I knew the people knew me and the other candidates, and I was willing for them to decide this matter; and whatever ticket they nominate will be my ticket. I think the democrats are scared and are now trying to scare our people with great negro tales. Haven't we heard this old tale over and over again for the last twenty years? and we have went right on, elected out ticket and no negro has got anybody here yet. It is an insult to intelligent people to throw the negro in their face, but there are a few people in Chilton that have not learned that some people know a few things themselves, and that the people can not be bought with a piece of dry loaf bread and beef; neither can they be scared by the big guns from other counties telling them that they have never got their share of the public school money, nor never will until they send a democrat to the legislature. Now talk about being honest and wanting the people to leave their party and join them, but I think instead of the people joining them we will get a large portion of the democracy. Well, the banner was filled up last week with lies against me. Said sixteen other candidates and myself were at Burwell. Now this is a LIE. I've not been to Burwell in six years, but this is about as close as the banner gets to the truth when speaking of me; but I think the people are onto the old thing and I have decided it is more honorable to have it against you than for you. Let everybody that is opposed to RING RULE and BOSSISM go out to our primary and vote for the men of their choice, and in November we will elect the nominees hands down. Respectfully,

L. H. REYNOLDS.

No man ought to be selected judge of probate who is not competent to fill the office. Dake is competent and honest.

VOTE FOR ALEX G. DAKE

Billingsley, July 18, 1904.

Editor Union:

I wish to call attention of the voters of Chilton county to R. P. Kendrick for the office of county commissioner for the third district. I've known Mr. Kendrick for seven years. He will make a good commissioner. He is a successful farmer and a high-toned gentleman in every respect, and he is an old-time populist. Now, boys, let us give him a big majority the 26th. I hope to see a good ticket nominated, for we are sure to win, and hope the people will look to the best interests of their county. But I feel sure that they will do this, so I remain a true populist.

VOTE FOR DAKE.

(Communicated.)

There must be no taint of fraud in the primary election to be held on the 26th of July. The primary must be honestly and fairly held, and an honest and truthful statement of the vote declared. If by trick or other improper means the will of the people is circumvented, let it be understood that the wrongdoers will be held to a strict accountability and the laws of the state enforced. Let there be an honest election—no rascality or fraud. The people will be satisfied with nothing short of this.

EVERGREEN.

Just a few items from this place. Politics are a little warm, but we'll settle that on July 26th. We are very deeply interested in a free school that is being taught at our place by two ladies from Montgomery. Dr. B. J. Baldwin is paying all expenses and I want to say that it is appreciated by every patron of our school, and we hope it will be a school long remembered by parents and pupils. Miss Mittie Grant is dangerously ill at the home of her father, Mr. J. J. Grant. We wish her a speedy recovery. John W. Grant, of Double Springs, Miss., is visiting his father, J. J. Grant. Weather dry in our community. We hear that Henry Williams, our neighbor, has bought out the Verbena Drug Co. Wish you good luck, Henry. White Elephant B. B. club crossed bats with the Green Ridge team on Verbena's diamond last Saturday. The game was an interesting one, and at the close the score was 9 to 7 in favor of the White Elephants. If this escapes the waste basket I'll come again.

SCHOOL BOY.

PROVIDENCE.

A few words about our "children's day" at Providence last Sunday. Early in the day people gathered from every direction, and continued to come until noon, when we had about 400 present. Services began at 10 o'clock with the school marching from the school house into the church. About fifty pupils and teachers were in line. All being seated, the rest of the space was filled to overflowing with relatives and friends and devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. J. H. Thomas. Then Professor Anderson took charge of the programme and the children recited their pieces with credit to themselves and honor to the community. These were concluded by 12 o'clock, when the audience was dismissed and the good sisters from far and near proceeded to spread a long table with such things as people generally relish and appreciate at that time of day. The afternoon was devoted to hearing Hon. L. H. Reynolds lecture on Sunday school work and singing sweet songs with a beautiful rain falling, laying the dust and cooling the air. When we consider all these good things, accompanied by the best behavior, we were enabled to return home feeling that it had been a day well spent in honor to God and to the advancement of His work. May the blessing of God rest upon the dear good people that met with us on last Sunday at Providence.

A LOVER OF SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

COOPERS.

Editor Union:

The outlook is this: The dems are disgusted with themselves and charge each other with getting the party in such a fix, but I tell them they are just a gang without a platform or principles. I heard a democrat say he'd never vote another democratic ticket; that he could not stand a party that would steal school funds from the white children in Chilton to carry to the black belt, as Judge Richardson said in his speech at Klinners a week ago. I notice in the banner a piece signed "J. Z." You see it's the last letter in the alphabet, so I think he is about the last dem to speak. He says the Cooper man is having a fine time airing. Yes, and I've got some questions to ask him. Did you know that the democrats elected a vice president of the United States who had a negro woman for a wife, and had mulatto children by her? Did you know that Grover Cleveland appointed a negro a minister to represent this country to a white nation? Did you know that Senator Morgan, of Alabama, voted for the confirmation of Fred Douglas, a notorious negro politician, as United States marshal? If you will learn the history of your democratic party you will find that stealing school money from children is not near all that your party has been guilty of. "Cryton" says in the banner that there were 17 candidates at the speaking at Burwell, which is not so of course, and three hearers. Now, Frankie, I'll bet you a ginger cake that you got your information from a disfranchised democrat, if you ever got any information at all, and that accounts for your "lying under a mistake." Boys, the demmies haven't any principle, so they holler "nigger" and what few "boot licks" they can get holler nigger also. The dems are doing all they can to keep the boys out of the primary, but they got the cold shoulder down here. Well, demmies, we're going to bury you face foremost this fall, and you will LIE still, but you will be in a political hell, which you deserve. These are the views of an "old line conservative populist

VOTE FOR DAKE.

(Communicated.)

Kincheon, July 18, 1904.

Editor Union:

I wish to speak a few words to the voters of Chilton county through your paper. The primary will soon be here, and I think this is a time to think twice and vote once. We'll have the hardest fight this time we have ever had. The dems will send the best orators they can get to this county, and they will draw pictures of the past life of our nominees and hold them up to the people. The dems have no issue; they gave an ex-governor for an issue, but failed to get it. The republican party could not find a republican in Alabama for a federal judge that would put negroes on the jury; but they had no trouble about that, for the dems furnished them their best man for that position, so they could get something to harp about. We must try to nominate men that can't be criticised by the opposing party. I see in THE UNION where a few people are trying to dictate for the voters, but as that is purely democratic I don't think it will amount to anything. So let us have an honest primary and nominate a clean ticket and success is sure. Good men on our ticket will add more to our strength than all the orators that can be put in the field. Success to THE UNION and its readers.

GEO. W. EDWARDS.

(Communicated.)

We hope that no republican will be deceived or misled into the support of what is known as the combine ticket, understood to have been agreed upon by certain candidates for the nomination on July 26th. The republicans are opposed to combination in politics, to cliques, rings and corrupt methods. We have reason to believe that such combination has been formed and desire to warn republicans against the evil designs of the ring.

SUPPOSE THE LITTLE COWSLIP

Suppose the little cowslip
Should hang its golden cup,
And say "I'm such a tiny flower,
I'd better now grow up!"
How many a weary traveler
Would miss its fragrant smell!
How many a child would grieve
To lose it from the dell!

Suppose the glistening dewdrop
Upon the grass should say,
"What can a little dewdrop do?
I'd better roll away!
The blade on which it rested,
Before the day was done,
Without a drop to moisten it
Would wither in the sun.

How many deeds of Kindness
A little child can do,
Although it has but little strength,
And little wisdom, too!
It wants a loving spirit
Much more than strength, to prove
How many things a child can do
For others, by its love.

The SHILLING and the BARONET'S INVITATION

I had just discovered a shilling in my pocket. It was the only shilling—the only coin, in fact—I was at that moment capable of producing.

With the calmness born of desperation I reviewed the situation.

In one minute by the big station clock beneath which I stood Beryl would be standing by my side (she is as punctual as she is pretty). We were to lunch—somewhere—and afterwards go to whichever theater she—I mean we—fancied.

My worldly wealth lay in the sovereign case that (doubtless) reposed on the dressing table of my Kensington "digs."

The total "assets" on my person consisted of the wretched shilling aforementioned, one visiting card in my case, a signet ring, and a letter from Sir John Kenway of Montpelier Hall, Trautbridge, asking me to run over for a week's shooting.

There was no time to realize on the one article of value—the ring. Beryl never carries more than ninepence in her purse on principle. I knew no one from whom I could borrow. To confess to Beryl was not to be thought of. Only the previous week I had been lectured severely for combined extravagance and carelessness.

Something must be done—but what? Perhaps for once Beryl might be unpunctual. Dare I risk——?

It was Beryl looking alluringly sweet, and in a beautiful temper (her temper varies a little at times).

"And now, Jack, dearest, we'll have a lovely evening. I've been looking forward to it so much. First of all I want you to take me to the New Empire Restaurant, if you don't think it too extravagant."

I converted a groan into a sigh of rapture.

"Shall we have a cab, darling?" I asked jauntily—the jauntiness such as might be displayed by the dishonest bank clerk on the eve of audit day.

"Certainly not," was my sweetheart's emphatic answer. "We'll walk, Jack. There's plenty of time." And I felt as the bank clerk would on hearing that the day of reckoning had been postponed a few hours.

When we reached the dazzling exterior of the restaurant, despair reigned in my heart, but the shilling remained intact in my pocket.

I ate as though in a dream, while

"Shall we have a cab, darling?" I asked jauntily.

Beryl was in raptures with the dinner and the service, and the head waiter inquired if all had been to our entire satisfaction.

I told him with almost pathetic earnestness that my companion and I had never till this night realized what it was to dine.

"By the way," I said carelessly, "have you a room to accommodate a club dinner party—about twenty people?"

Yes, he had the very room; would I care to see it?

I would. Beryl graciously excused me and we made our way to the banqueting hall in question. Once inside I told him quickly the state of affairs, and as he listened I had an object lesson in mobility of the Italian countenance. I produced my card and declared solemnly the money should be sent to him the first thing on the morrow. He gazed at the card doubtfully—even suspiciously—and I felt I was lost.

A flash of inspiration. I took Sir John Kenway's invitation from my pocket and thrust it into his hand triumphantly.

"Now, will you trust me?" I asked.

The crested notepaper, the imposing address and the contents of the letter turned well nigh certain defeat into glorious victory. The proprietor bowed almost abjectly and entreated me to forgive his original hesitation. He would have the bill sent to my address, and I would send the ridiculous amount when it suited my gracious purpose.

He gazed at the card doubtfully—even suspiciously.

"Pay the bill, Jack, dearest," she said. "I've been looking over the theater list, and if you want to please me you'll take me to see "The One and Only Girl" at the Frivolity. I daresay we can get seats, as it's been running a long time."

I informed Beryl that I had settled with the proprietor outside. I gave the waiter sixpence out of the shilling, and he looked at me with a mildly disappointed gaze.

When the bus deposited us at the Frivolity door the lordly sum of fourpence remained to me.

I laid my plans with desperate, consummate cunning, requesting Beryl to stay in the theater vestibule for a moment while I inquired if any upper circle seats remained.

"Have you two—upper—circles?" I stammered, as my turn came at last. How I wished the encyclopedic, officious commissionaire might be hopelessly in error.

But he wasn't. There were plenty of seats—good seats, too.

"How many, sir?" inquired the clerk.

"Two," I groaned.

He handed me the tickets. The horrible moment had come, and with an air of almost conscious guilt I thrust my signet ring through the barrier.

"Trust me till the morning," I entreated. "I've left my money at home and my fiancee is with me." In what fearful suspense did I await his reply.

"Sorry, sir," came the fateful words, "but I daren't do it."

Happy thought! Again I withdrew Sir John's invitation from its resting place. Inscribed in the bottom left-hand corner was my name and address. What a virtue is method—especially in titled people.

For the second time the crested notepaper of my only swagger friend turned the fortunes of war. I got my tickets and bounded up the stairs with joyous steps.

How I reveled in "The One and Only Girl." How I laughed at the jokes of the comedian, and how I applauded the efforts of the artistes! I felt like the victorious general tasting the delights of home after a hard won campaign.

When the curtain had come down for the last time I breathed a sigh of unutterable relief.

But my ordeal was not over, for when we emerged I perceived, to my dismay, that it had been raining and a slight drizzle was still falling.

Then came a great, final blow.

"Jask, dear, I think you can take me to the station in a cab," said Beryl, after a glance at the weather conditions. "But, mind you, don't give the man more than a shilling."

A cab dashed toward us. Black tragedy loomed before my eyes. An adroit veiled inquiry in the course of the evening had informed me that Beryl's purse contained the sum of threepence. We had sevenpence between us. There was no hope for it. Only confession would avert the coming catastrophe.

"Beryl," I said, humbly, fearfully, "I can't——"

Then a strange thing happened, as the novelists say.

The horse slipped and fell to the ground, kicking furiously.

Beryl grasped my arm in a paroxysm of terror.

"Oh, Jack, Jack," she cried. "Oh, look at that poor horse. Oh—h!"

I withdrew her quickly into the shelter of the theater, and hope and joy flew into my heart again.

"It's all right now, Beryl," I whispered cheerfully. "The horse is up again. We can get into the cab."

"Get into the cab?" screamed Beryl. "I wouldn't for worlds after that. Horrid, dangerous things! We'll go by 'bus or walk, Jack."

"My darling," I remonstrated with superb recklessness, "I really couldn't think of such a thing. Now let me call a cab, like a nice, sweet, brave little sweetheart."

Beryl faced me with a look of unswerving determination showing from her lovely eyes (they are really lovely eyes).

"Jack," she commanded, "if you call one of those horrible, sliding, deadly things you can go home in it yourself. I'm going by 'bus, and if I can't get a 'bus I'll walk. So there."

After that, of course, there was nothing left for me but humble submission. And therefore I "submitted" accordingly.—Chicago American.

HIS PRINCE EDWARD GIRL.

Good Cause for Representative Capron's Gratitude.

When the members of the house naval committee were on a cruise up the Atlantic coast they reached one point where an international dinner was given, and men from Canada and from this country vied with each other in saying things that would promote good fellowship and comity between two peoples living under different flags. Representative Capron of Rhode Island, who was not of the naval committee, however, was there and finally was called upon for a speech.

"I can't say what all these gentlemen have said who preceded me," he began. I have not had much to do in the work of binding two countries together, but I have a deep feeling of gratitude toward Canadians, and especially those of the islands. Many years ago there came to my home a girl from Prince Edward island, and she has ever since remained there to brighten it."

The applause which greeted this bit of sentiment shook the rafters. Capron had outstripped all others. Some time afterward this episode was retold and among those present was a man well acquainted with Capron and his family.

"Why, Capron," he said, "your wife wasn't from Prnce Edward island."

"I know it," replied Capron, meekly. "Our cook came from that place."—Washington Post.

He Got the "Raise."

Frank Leslie's tells a story of how industry was rewarded. A year ago a manufacturer hired a boy. For months there was nothing noticeable about the boy except that he never took his eyes off the machine he was running. A few weeks ago the manufacturer looked up from his work to see the boy standing beside his desk.

"What do you want?" he asked.

"Want me pay raised."

"What are you getting?"

"T'ree dollars a week."

"Well, how much do you think you are worth?"

"Four dollars."

"You think so, do you?"

"Yessir, an' I've been t'inkin' so fer t'ree weeks, but I've been so blame busy I haven't had time to speak to you about it."

The boy got the "raise."

Cargoes of Love.

The soul is proven every day; each hour
Life holds a mete-wand up to me and you,
To test the spirit's depth and girth and power.—
Whether the seasoned timbers hold yet true.

Of ember fineness this divining-rod,
The cargo silken-rich, the ballast gold;
The ship-holds swell with freightage dear to God,
Pure samite tinct of heaven in bale and fold.

We are the ships (our unsure voyage Time):
They sail from Birth, and touch awhile at Death.
Our Coan silk, e'er sought of every clime
To vesture mart and home, airy as breath.

Is given, not bought with aught beneath the sun:
Its consignor hath sure been God above;
The loom is Christ whereon it may be spun,
And all earth's isles be clothed, with cloth of Love.

—Clifford Lanier.

Betrothed at Birth.

In some parts of West Africa the girls have long engagements. On the day of their birth they are betrothed to a baby boy a trifle older than themselves, and at the age of twenty they are married. The girls know of no other way of getting a husband, and so they are quite happy and satisfied. As wives they are patterns of obedience, and the marriages usually turn out a success.

FRENCH QUEEN OF THE MAY.

Pretty Custom That Prevails in Southern Villages.

An ancient custom which still obtains in many villages in the south of France is a pretty variation of the choosing of the May queen with which we are so familiar. At this season of the year the mayor—each tiny village in France boasts of a mayor—and six of his political officers choose from among the village maidens the most beautiful girl. As soon as the choice is made known the queen, dressed in white even to a long white veil and a wreath of white roses, assembles with her parents and all the villagers in front of the mayor's house. Here he and six friends, dressed in frock coats and top hats, form in procession, the mayor and queen leading, and march to the church, where there is a short ceremony.

They then march back to the mayor's house, where a favored few are entertained at luncheon. When he proposes her health he enumerates her virtues, kisses her on both cheeks and hands her an envelope which contains the prize, $200 in money. But the ceremony does not end here. They form in procession, the band leading this time, and in a sort of "follow my leader" game walk through the village, up lanes and over hills for three hours. That evening a ball is given at the inn, where the queen dances first with the mayor and his six friends and afterward with the lads of the village, and so the celebration ends. The queen's white veil and wreath, are carefully folded away and are brought out again only when she becomes a bride.

OPOSSUM A CRAFTY BEAST.

Writer Declares He Is Very Much More Knave Than Fool.

To the uninitiated the opossum is a slow-going, stupid beast, with hardly enough ambition to eat his food. But those who have studied his habits declare that there is more of the rogue than the fool in his make-up, and that his apparent stupidity is but a part of his business policy. He seldom goes hungry, and he always has a hole to crawl into when he is sleepy. And, in spite of the slowness, he manages, some way, to catch many animals much swifter than he is. It is said that even the brisk squirrel falls a prey to him in the open woods, where one would think the spry little creature had all the advantage. The opossum catches rats and mice, and eats ground birds and their eggs. He is not entirely restricted to a meat diet, however, but is fond of nearly all the berries and other wild fruits that grow in the woods and fields, and has been known to creep into orchards and berry patches to devour cultivated fruits.—Detroit News-Tribune.

Great Sea Disasters.

Loss of the Russian flagship Petropavlovsk at Port Arthur, with Admiral Makaroff and an estimated strength of nearly 800 officers and men, while a severe blow to Russian prestige in the far East, is one of those catastrophes in naval warfare to which an actual combatant is always liable, though happily their occurrence is not common. In 1759, when "Hawke did bang Monsieur Conflans" at Quiberon bay, Sir Edward Hawke ordered his pilot to lay the Royal George of 100 guns, alongside the Soleil Royal, the French admiral's flagship. Before this could be done another French ship, La Superbe, of seventy guns, gallantly interposed, and, receiving her opponent's broadside, went down into the deep with her colors flying and 650 souls on board. Her revenge, however, came on Aug. 28, 1782, when the Royal George sunk at anchor off Spithead in a squall.

He Caught the Idea.

A schoolteacher of Bayonne recently had occasion to talk to her scholars about the different spellings of the word "to." She explained with great care the ways in which the word could be spelled and the meaning of it, as spelled in the different ways. Finally, in order to find out if the children had properly grasped the idea, she decided to give a test.

"Now, children, as quickly as you can, I want you to give me a sentence with all three of these spellings contained in it."

Hardly were the words out of her mouth before up went a hand.

"Well, Isaac?" said the teacher, interrogatively, and the boy, who was the solitary Jewish child in the class, answered glibly:

"Two dollars is too much to spend."

"Thy Will Be Done."

Yesterday, when I said, "Thy will be done,"
I knew not what that will of thine would be;
What clouds would gather black across my sun,
What storms and desolation waited me;
I knew thy love would give me what was best,
And I am glad I could not know the rest.

"Thy will be done," I say, and to the scroll
Of unread years consenting set my name;
Day after day their pages will unroll
In shining words that prove thy love the same
Until my years are gathered into one
Eternal, sanctified, "Thy will be done."

Red a Favorite Flag Color.

Red seems to be the most popular of national colors, if flags may be used as criterions. Of the twenty-five leading national flags nineteen have red in them. The same cannot be said of any other color. The chief flags that are marked with red are those of the United States, England, France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain, Denmark, Belgium, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, Mexico, Chile, Portugal, and Venezuela.

FROM THE FOREthought NOTEBOOKS

By Earl Pratt, Oak Park, Illinois.

How the Employe is Personally Benefited by Being Careful with the Employer's Stationery.

The manager of the purchasing department of a large concern was telling me about his troubles and I was sitting on a high stool by his clerk's desk. I was also on the pay roll of the concern and studying methods.

The manager said something that made me think of something, and I grabbed a finely engraved letter head to write my thought on.

"You had better not let the general manager see you do that—he would go for you if he knew that you used that sheet for pencil paper."

Then I began to think about such things if done by many people, and decided that if all the employes were as careless as I in the use of expensive paper the destruction of stationery would cost the house more than my idea was worth.

While speaking to a group of employes a manager asked me to mention the waste of stationery. It is not much for one, but there are large concerns which could afford to hire more help and pay larger salaries if the employes would be more careful and earnest in their work.

Being careful with the [illegible] others is an exercise in [illegible]ods, and a source of personal [illegible]ment. To use stationery [illegible] because it costs us nothing [illegible] more than it does the [illegible] pays for it, because it [illegible] individuality, while it [illegible] the other person's profits.

Couldn't Sell Her Doll

It is said that conditions and one's station in life create the difference in the sense of appreciation of men, and this morning this was plainly demonstrated when Constable P. D. Doyle conducted an auction for some time in front of the office of 'Squire William Sellers, selling the trunk and contents of Mrs. Mollie Smiddey. This woman lived in a suite of rooms in the vicinity of Vine avenue, with her little girl, a bright-eyed child with waving curls of raven black, and every one who saw the child was attracted by her happy disposition and beauty. The woman started to leave the city a few days ago for Augusta, Ga., it is claimed, leaving a number of unpaid bills, and an attachment process was procured before 'Squire Sellers, and Constable Doyle was given the paper to serve. He attached a trunk and published the sale for today before the magistrate's office. He began the auction with a small bevy of court officers, lawyers and casual passers, and the officer rapidly dispatched the business. He sold several articles of wearing apparel of the woman, many articles of furnishings for the mantel and parlor, and when nearly through, or to the bottom of the trunk, he grabbed down and secured a bundle of clothing which the little girl had worn.

"This looks hard, boys, but I'm to sell 'em, so how much am I [illegible]

One of the constables bid [illegible] and the crier proceeded with [illegible]

The next article sold was a [illegible] shoes that the little girl had [illegible] and the officer obdurately [illegible] goods without remark.

The next article was one that [illegible] on him. He found a large and [illegible]ful bisque doll, carefully wra[illegible] a silk cloth. He hesitated a [illegible] and said:

"This must be sold, too, [illegible] much am I bid?"

He held the doll over his [illegible] repeated:

"How much am I bid, [illegible]

Then the officer was affe[illegible] visible. He [illegible] Marcus was [illegible] point of making a bid, but [illegible] restrained him with:

"Boys, I can't do it—I have [illegible] at home, and I know [illegible] loves her doll. I will send the [illegible] little Smiddey girl in A[illegible] it is the last act of my life."

The officer wiped the tears [illegible] eyes, laid the doll aside and [illegible] with the sale.

But there was little [illegible] thereafter in his conduct, and [illegible] ed that the action of the crow[illegible] ding had been smothered.—K[illegible] Sentinel.

His Life for Duty

Last of all they told the story of old Captain Conkling and the Holyoke dam—a story known to every diver. It seems there was a leak in this dam, and the water was rushing through with so strong a suction that it seemed certain death for a diver to go near enough to stop the leak. Yet it was extremely important that the leak be stopped—in fact, the saving of the dam depended on it. So Capt. Conkling, who was in charge of the job, induced one of his divers to go down, and reluctantly the man put on his suit, but insisted on having an extra rope, and a very strong one, tied around his waist.

"What's that for?" asked Conkling.

"That's to help get my body out if the life line breaks," said the diver.

"Go on and do your work," replied Conkling, who had little use for sentiment.

It happened exactly as the diver feared. He was drawn into the suction of the hole, and when they tried to pull him up both hose and life line parted and the man was drowned, but they managed to rescue his b[illegible] the heavy line, just as he had [illegible]

Then Conkling called for [illegible] diver, but not a man responded [illegible] said they weren't that kind.

"All right," said the captain [illegible] businesslike way; "then I'll g[illegible] myself and stop that hole," [illegible] called the men to dress him.

At this time Capt. Conkling [illegible] years old and had retired long [illegible] from active diving. But he [illegible] strong as a horse still, and [illegible] had ever questioned his courag[illegible]

In vain they tried to dissua[illegible] "I'll stop that hole," said he, [illegible] don't want any extra rope, e[illegible]

He kept his word. He went [illegible] and he stopped the hole, but [illegible] with his dead body, and to-da[illegible] where in the Holyoke dam [illegible] bones of brave old Capt. Conk[illegible] cased in a full diving dress, [illegible] hose and life line, buried in th[illegible] of masonry. Making of a Skeptic

When father got his picture took he had a winnin' smile,
Jes' like an angel whispered to him every little while;
He wore a stand-up collar and a button-hole bouquet,
An' looked the fam'ly over in a kind an' patient way.
Like nothin' ever riled him. None who saw him would have said
He'd have the heart to take a strap to me out in the shed.
The photograph can never do full justice to the look
That father's face had on the day he got his picture took.

But when we got back home it wasn't any time at all
Till father smoked his pipe an' left his coat out in the hall,
An' looked as fierce as anything, an' started in to scold
Because the steak was tough an' everything was gettin' cold.

I tell you it was somethin' most [illegible]

To see his disposition undergo [illegible]

Or of a violinist, with his hair [illegible]

I think about the day that father [illegible]

A SERMON FOR SUNDAY

A STRONG DISCOURSE ENTITLED, "GOD'S LOVE FOR MAN."

The Rev. Dr. Robert Rogers Delivers a Thoughtful and Convincing Address Urging Us to Abjure Selfishness and Animalism—Christ the Ideal.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—Sunday morning the Rev. Dr. Robert Rogers, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, preached a thoughtful and convincing sermon on "God's Love For Man." The texts were from John iii:16: "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whoso believeth on Him, might not perish, but have everlasting life," and Mark ix:24: "Lord, I believe, help Thou mine unbelief." Dr. Rogers said among other things:

I begin our thought this morning with the great declaration of the beloved Apostle John who, better than any other of Christ's disciples, understood the vital meaning underlying the Master's life. Jesus was to John a distinct personality with whom he was acquainted, a man among men, but He was more than this. He was also at the same time the love of God incarnate in this Man's nature, so that He represented the nature of God, and His feeling and desires and purposes toward mankind. God loved the world. Now, after beginning with this thought, I have taken another verse from Scripture, to indicate man's attitude of mind toward John's declaration, "Lord, I believe, help Thou mine unbelief."

John's statement is a condensed but very complete outline of what the Christian religion aims to teach men. It is the message of the Christian Church that Jesus Christ is the personal demonstration of God's love for man. The life and words of Jesus are the illustrations of how God loves and how He acts toward man, and also what God desires that man shall think and do toward God and toward his fellow man.

Now this kind of thinking leads us into the acknowledgment of the supernatural. It brings us to the admission that our Divine Father loves man, and teaches him, and guides him by laws and standards which He reveals to man according to his needs. In other words, the Christian religion stands for the presence of God in this life we are now living, and that He has help to give to man, and demands to make of man.

There are countless men and women who believe implicitly in this statement of God's presence ruling over life, and who live in their belief, offering up themselves to divine guidance, regretting their sins and imploring pardon in perfect faith that it will be granted. There are, on the other hand, some perhaps, who say they have no belief in the divine and spiritual, and who would place themselves outside of the declarations of the Christian religion, but I believe this number to be few and growing smaller every day, as the fuller vision of the world and its rich spiritual meaning dawns upon their intelligence. But there is another large class with whom I am specially concerned, who believe and yet do not believe. They would not deny the Christian faith, neither are they ready to give their full allegiance to it. There is a multitude of such people among our men and women, and may we not ask seriously why is this the case? Is it because Christ's teaching and His life are so hard to be understood that spiritual things can make no derstood. Are some kinds so constituted naturally that spiritual things can make no effective appeal to them?

If we were for a moment to admit this it would destroy the greatest power which we believe inherent in Christ's religion, namely, that to every man, bond or free, black or yellow, barbarian or Scythian, Jew or Gentile, learned or unlearned, rich or poor, it has the power of entering into his heart and transforming his life. There is no respect of persons with God. I grant you that Christ found that there were certain places where even He could not present His message with conviction, but the cause of His failure was the hardness of men's hearts and not the difficulty of comprehending His gospel, and this same reason will be found to hold good in these days.

Atheism is no longer supposed to be a necessary adjunct of the scientist; but on the contrary, the men who are opening the widest visions of new truth to the world in these days and teaching the profoundest lessons to mankind are men who are sincere believers in the message of God's presence as revealed by Jesus Christ, or at least are able to say with earnestness, "Lord, I believe, help Thou mine unbelief." When we come to consider our own lives and those of the ordinary men and women around about whom we can understand, what is it that prevents the message of Jesus Christ from having the effect upon us all that it ought to have?

There has been for the past few years a warning sounded that men are not attending our Christian churches, and the reasons are being given in various ways. Clergymen are uninteresting; churches are cold, uninspiring places; doctrines are antiquated and illiberal and meaningless to man in the struggle for life. Perhaps there is a truth in all these statements; it is not difficult for even a stupid man to find a plausible excuse for anything he cares to do, or to leave undone. Parents who are bringing up children, teachers who are educating them, understand the readiness of plausible excuses.

But these excuses, whenever given, are not the real reasons why some men do not attend church. Let me say, first, that I believe it is open to demonstration that a larger number of men are interested in the work of the church and attending its services and obeying its inspirations than at any other time in history. And what is more important, they are attending churches willingly without the compulsion of ancient times when heaven and hell were regarded as in the sole power of the church, and men were afraid to absent themselves. Our Y. M. C. A.'s were never so prosperous. The religious nature of our college students was never more genuine than in our own days.

But to speak of those who are not attending our churches, is it not because they have never had a true vision of the vital reality and practicability of Christ's messages? The great majority of men in this country, at least, are nominal Christians. They send their children to Sunday school, they like to have their wives and sisters in union with the church, and if asked whether they themselves believe in the teachings of Christ and His Church, would either evade the question or else say they could follow Christian precepts without attending church. Is not the fault of lack of attendance on Christian worship due rather to the manner of life we are living than to a definite unbelief in the virtue of the Christian religion? They are so much absorbed in the struggle for money that they have neither time nor desire to see anything else. Every one is hunting for it, the business man, the politician, the professional man, the laborer, the coachman, the waiter, the conductor, the porter, the barber, the messenger, the clergyman who is paid for burials and baptisms, the corporation. This one craze seems to leave no part of American society intact, rich and poor, high and low, alike, are infected with this disease, which is sapping all the spiritual and moral energy of the generation.

The church is not the only place from which such men and women absent themselves. Our lectures on history and travel, and science and art are giving up their business because the cry has gone forth that men will not attend lectures. The literature that appeals to people is not that which lifts the mind and heart to higher thoughts, but the type of flimsy novel that simply entertains.

The Church of Christ is no longer a comfortable place in which the unrepentant sinner can sit. Religion has become much more of a reality to every man. It fills a more sacred place. It is not regarded in these days as simply a combination of rites and ceremonies, performed in a special building, but religion is known by all men to be co-ordinate and co-extensive with life and the man who willingly lives sinfully and in disregard of Christ's standard will not add to his degradation by playing the hypocrite and impostor. This means that in the minds of irreligious men there is a growing respect for religion and a sound regard for the church even among those who do not attend. I say that it is the life which the age is calling on men to live that is weakening the religious life and faith of men. Men cannot serve God and mammon is true forever. Can this evil be overcome, and how? I believe that it can, and the way to overcome it is to satisfy men that we are living in a moral and spiritual world in which God is present and in which He makes His demands. Professor James, of Harvard, speaks of the universality of religious experience opening up a new world which science has hitherto scoffed at, but which must be recognized if we know by our own experience that there is a realm of thought, of love, of conscience, of righteousness, toward which things our hearts yearn. We know more than ever the laws of this department of life, how, under God, beneficence and growth and power are added to life by their obedience, and how injury and weakness and suffering are the resultants of disobedience to the individual and to the nation and the race. Men believe in these things, because they see them. If they do not believe in their power as you and I, dear Christian friends do, it is because they have been hindered by other things from looking at them seriously enough. If they can be turned from the craze of the age, which is selfishness, they will be able to see and appreciate the workings of this real kingdom of love and Christ in our midst. If the church is to help men it must open its doors and heart to such men. It must not refuse their admission or retard them by insulting them when they come. If a man is looking for righteousness and anxious to govern his life according to that inspiration, the church ought to be ready to give to such an honest man all he is ready and willing to receive. Let us not be afraid of our sacraments being desecrated. Men will not come to them unless they really want them and believe in them. We ask too much of men about what they believe or do not believe. The working and living Church of Christ is not that which shall only have a place and a welcome for those who are fully equipped with faith in all its sacred doctrines, but a church which, like Christ, shall draw all men unto it and gradually, by its spiritual love and care, nourish men into its highest privileges and possessions.

If men can believe something of Christ's revelation of God, if they can say, "Lord, I believe," it becomes then the part of every Christian as an individual and of all Christians as an organization to help their unbelief until men can enter into the fulness of His message and take for their inspiration in life, "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whoso believeth on Him might not perish, but have everlasting life." This is the Christian's message of God's presence among us, God loving men, inspiring and guiding them toward His own ideal of perfectness. This is the opening of the gates of salvation to men, from selfishness and animalism, into the happiness and encouragement of knowing that we are the sons of God, for God hath not called us to uncleanness, but to holiness. When the churches of Christ take this attitude toward men and men shall learn that the ministration of the church is toward helping them out of their sins and mistakes rather than in a constant condemnation of their faults, I believe they will be found within its walls, ready to be helped and led toward a larger knowledge of God and His love.

Doing One's Best.

We should not only seek to do our best, but also to do the best that can be done. No man can tell when he has done his best. The best should always be the highest reach possible. The striving for excellence is not alone for the sake of the life it makes possible. No work should ever be regarded as "good enough" if it could be made better. It was said of Lord Brougham that such was his love of excellence that, "if his station in life had been only that of a bootblack, he would never have rested satisfied until he had become the best bootblack in England." It is no wonder, remarks the Baptist Union, that he was one of the best men in the empire. In seeking to do his best, ever aiming at excellence, he was gradually making himself one of the best men. And after all, the great purpose of life is only achieved when one not only does his best, but is his best.

Religious Thought.

You cannot begin anything you never did. Organization, genesis, is God.—Campbell Morgan.

When a man thinks he is the whole church he is apt to ignore the Head of the Church.—Ram's Horn.

Contentment is sunlight, discontentment is starlight, malcontentment is night.—United Presbyterian.

A man does not have to go to heaven by freight simply because he cannot express himself in meeting.—Ram's Horn.

When the Christian rises above such small details as telling the truth and dealing honestly God is going to let him drop hard.—Ram's Horn.

No one need go down to eternal death who is able to turn around and go the other way, for the other way leads to eternal life.—United Presbyterian.

Christian Submission.

A missionary in India, Rev. W. P. Byers, tells this story, which illustrates that the gospel carries its comfort in distress to the convert in India as it does in this country:

"One of our older Bengali boys, whom we were counting on to help us in the future, was carried off in a few hours by a violent fever. His poor father had struggled to give his boy every chance to learn, hoping he would become a Christian worker. But the Master saw fit to take him for higher service in the kingdom above. When this father was told that his son had passed away he bowed his head in submission worthy of any Christian in any country, as he said: "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."—Ram's Horn.

Manhood.

Manhood has two or three qualities. First, self-assertion, and a good many men never get beyond that—they become bullies or egotists. They always get their way, ride rough shod over every man. I do not say self-assertion is to be destroyed, it is to be directed, and that is the second quality, self-direction. That power belongs to every man. God Himself does not invade or destroy it. The powers of self-assertion and self-direction reach their climax in self-surrender to the highest.—Rev. W. T. McDowell, New York City.

A Wish.

To be free from narrowness;
To respond to the nearest need,
To help all;
To magnify the good in the meanest,
To minimize with love apparent faults in others;
To give God His opportunity in me;
To further His plan for the world He loves;
Let this be my wish.

—W. P. Landers.

UNCONQUERABLE MELANCHOLY.

The pessimist looked on the weather map
And a mournful sigh sighed he;
For he was a most unhappy chap,
Unhappy as could be.

"In January we're frozen tight,"
He sang both sad and slow;
"In February the slush we fight
And in March the chill winds blow.

"In April come the mud and rain
And in May the rain and mud,
In June the heat bids men complain;
July still fires the blood.

"September humidly depressed;
October threatens chill;
November's climate, all unblessed,
That threat doth soon fulfil.

"And in December air severe
Our aches and pains we nurse;
And then we start another year
Which probably is worse."

—Washington Star.

An Eccentric Bishop.

Bishop Wilson of Calcutta had as housekeeper a venerable lady who remembered the duel between Sir Philip Francis and Warren Hastings on Aug. 17, 1780. On entering the cathedral on a Sunday morning, fully robed, lawn sleeves and all, and passing the pew where the old lady sat he would pause and give her the "kiss of peace" before all the congregation, and this although he had met her at breakfast.

His sermons, too, were racy. Preaching against dishonesty, especially in horseflesh, as one of the great English failings in India, he went on, "Nor are we, servants of the altar, free from yielding to thistemptation." Pointing to the occupant of the reading desk below him: "There is my dear and venerable brother the archdeacon, down there. He is an instance of it. He once sold me a horse. It was unsound. "I was a stranger, and he took me in."

Grim Humors of the Scaffold.

In walking to the scaffold in solemn procession a criminal once called to the governor of the prison: "Just oblige me, guv'nor, by telling me the day o' the week." "Monday," answered the surprised governor. "Monday!" exclaimed the prisoner, in disgusted tones; "well, this 'ere's a fine way of beginning a week, ain't it?" And he marched on with dissatisfaction imprinted on every line of his face.

On another occasion an officious hangman whispered as he placed the white cap on his victim's head, "If there's anything you'd like to ask me, I'll be pleased to answer." The victim craned his neck forward and said in an equally low, but very much more anxious voice: "You might tell me is—is this scaffold safe?"—New Zealand Medical Journal.

Among the handsome window displays competing for first honors at the recent Confederate Re-Union at Nashville, Tenn., was that of the National Casket Co., in way of a handsome Confederate Grey Casket, draped with Silk Confederate Battle Flag with the figure of a Young Soldier, "A Son of the Old Veteran" standing guard, typefying the idea that the "Sons of Confederate Veterans" would faithfully guard his memory. The many visitors were very much impressed with the sentiment of the display made by the National Casket Co.

LOOMIS' BODY FOUND

Floats to the English Coast Not Far from Plymouth. Wound in Head.

FOUL PLAY GIVEN CREDENCE.

Examination of the Body Adds to Suspicions—That Wound Behind the Ear.

The body of F. Kent Loomis, who disappeared from the North German Lloyd steamer, Kaiser Wilhelm II, on June 20th last, as that vessel was nearing Plymouth, was found at Warrens Point, adjacent to Thurlestone Sands, some fifteen miles from Plymouth. The body was bruised by contact with rocks.

It was dressed in a gray overcoat, dark blue suit and white shirt. When the body was searched a gold watch, a quantity of American and English money in notes and coin were found in the pockets, and a card with the name, F. Kent Loomis. The pockets also contained a number of private papers. The American consul at Plymouth proceeded to Thurlestone and after viewing the body identified it as that of F. Kent Loomis.

The consul said there was an abrasion under the right ear. Deceased's watch had stopped at 6 o'clock. The steamer Kaiser Wilhelm II, from which Mr. Loomis disappeared, arrived at Plymouth at 2 o'clock in the morning.

The wound behind the right ear is described as being circular, large and clean, and it is thought that it was inflicted before death. It is surmised that Mr. Loomis' body fell into the water near Eddystone light house.

Joseph G. Stephens, American consul at Plymouth, in response to a telegram sent by the Associated Press tonight asking him if the local reports of foul play had any basis, or if he had any ground for suspicion regarding the death of Mr. Loomis, replied:

"I regret I can not make any statements prior to the inquest which will be held tomorrow. The wound on the back of the right ear is the size of a half dollar. The body is fairly well preserved, and especially about the top of the head, considering the time it has been in the water."

ONE FATALITY.

From Wreck on the Southern Near Kennedy Thursday.

L. M. Fields, who was slightly injured in a wreck on the Southern railway near Kennedy Thursday afternoon died Friday. Mr. Fields was on his way from Mississippi in company with his brother, who was also injured in the wreck. He was suffering with consumption in the last stages, and while his injuries were not sufficient to cause death, it is thought that the shock and fright of the wreck hastened his dath.

Alexander City Fire.

Secretary of State and Insurance Commissioner E. R. McDavid has received a report of the investigation of the recent fire at Alexander City, which destroyed about $10,000 worth of property. It was thought at the time, July 2d, that the fire was of incendiary origin, and on the recommendation of the mayor Mr. McDavid ordered an investigation. A large number of witnesses were examined, but no evidence was adduced to show that there was criminal action on the part of any one.

Governor Terrell and Senators Bacon and Clay, of Georgia, have asked Acting Secretary of War Oliver to authorize the quota of Georgia militia for the maneuvers at Manassas to be increased to the full strength of a brigade. The secretary has replied that this can not be done, but the brigade officers with companies of forty or fifty men will be allowed.

Government May Complain.

It is probable that the attention of the British government will be directed to a movement conducted officially by the Canadian government to induce immigration from the United States to the Northwest Territory.

It appears the Dominion department of interior through one of its assistant secretaries has been sending broadcast throughout the northwestern states circular letters principally addressed to clergymen, professional men and persons of influence describing in glowing terms the splendid resources of the Canadian northwest and inviting immigrants by the offer of 160 acres of land for each, free schools and sound laws.

Plant Enlarged.

In anticipation of a larger business than ever before, the Empire Plow company of Ensley is making a large addition to the woodworking department of their plant. The addition covers a space about 40 by 100 feet and practically doubles the capacity of that department. This concern spent over $20,000 last summer in new buildings and new machinery preparing for the trade last fall.

ALABAMA BABTISTS

Meet in Anniston in Annual Convention.

The Alabama Baptist state convention will convene in its 83d annual session in the Parker Memorial Baptist church at Anniston July 20 to 22, inclusive. Among the questions that will require the attention of the body will be the raising of a $500,000 endowment fund for Howard college, the general discussion of missions and the affairs of the educational institutions of the convention. The convention controls Howard college at East Lake, the Judson female institute at Marion, the Alabama Baptist orphanage at Evergreen and several other smaller educational institutions.

The paramount question before the convention will be missions. The reports of the home and foreign missionary secretaries are looked forward to with considerable interest.

The Baptist State convention has no executive powers. Its delegates can pass resolutions and make suggestions but each church is a government unto itself. The convention has no authority to change any of the creeds or laws. The churches in the various districts are divided into associations. The Baptists of Alabama number 150,000. There are 855 churches and 80 associations in the state. The value of church property is $1,379,592.

The officers of the convention are: H. S. D. Mallory, of Selma, president; C. L. Comer, of Eufaula, first vice president; R. H. Pettus, of Huntsville, second vice president; R. F. Manly, of Birmingham, treasurer; W. B. Compton, of Montgomery, corresponding secretary; S. P. Fowlke, of Birmingham auditor.

Another important matter that will come before the convention will be the question of placing evangelists in the field.

HUNT SUES FOR DAMGES.

Alleges False Imprisonment and Criminal Libel.

William A. Hunt has filed suit against R. C. Milliken, Sheriff Burgin, Judge Benners, of the inferior court of Birmingham, and the Fidelity Mutual Life Insurance company, asking for damages to the amount of $50,000 for an alleged false and malicious arrest and imprisonment.

The plaintiff also claims damages to the amount of $199,999 against the Fidelity Mutual Insurance company in a second suit, alleging libel.

Hunt was indicted on two charges in Texas. He was tried on the first indictment and acquitted, and was on the second bill found guilty and given a sentence of five years in the penitentiary. An appeal to the supreme court was taken and a decision was handed down reversing the decision of the lower court and ordering the defendant discharged.

RESERVOIR BREAKS,

Flooding Valley of Scottdale, Pa., Ruining Property and Crops.

With the roar of a Niagara the new reservoir of the Citizens' Water company at Scottdale, Pa., burst Sunday night, and more than 300,000,000 gallons of water rushed down the valley, sweeping all before it, and inundating crops and wrecking buildings in its path. It was discovered that the dam was in danger of breaking, and messengers were hastily sent through the valley to warn the people.

Hundreds of lives were thus saved, for an hour later the whole valley was under water.

The damage to the machinery and the reservoir alone will amount to $50,000. When the torrent swept down upon the valley buildings were torn from their foundations and carried on the crest of a great wave. Crops valued at thousands of dollars were completely wiped out. Bridges were carried away.

Child Kills Young Brother.

Edward Cox, the 8-year-old son of Dr. B. D. Cox, of Jackson, Ky., who was assassinated two years ago, accidentally shot and killed his 4-year-old brother Tom. The ball passed through the head. Edward was playing with an old rifle which belonged to his father and had not been discharged since the latter's death.

SAW HIM RUN AWAY.

Incendiary Fire In Montgomery Lumber Yard.

Fire destroyed the plant of the Alabama Rift Flooring company two miles from Montgomery Sunday morning. The loss is estimated at $75,000. It is thought the blaze was of incendiary origin, as the watchman saw a man run away from one of the dry kilns just before the fire broke out.

The plant consisted of a large planing mill, two dry kilns, a large sized, dust house and boiler room. The whole covered four acres of space. There was $54,350 insurance.

Coke Ovens Idle.

All the coke ovens of the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railway company in Pratt City are closed.

The company has two batteries, a larger and a smaller battery. The number of ovens in them will exceed 500 and 300 or 400 men are thrown out of work by the shut down which was necessitated by the mines in this district being idle.

Extracts from the general election law of Alabama:

Section 2. The following persons shall be disqualified both from registering and voting: All idiots and insane persons; those who were by reason of conviction of crime disqualified from voting at the time of the ratification of the constitution on November 28, 1901; those who have been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted of treason, murder, arson, embezzlement, malfeasance in office, larceny, receiving stolen property, obtaining money under false pretenses, perjury, subornation of perjury, robbery, assault with intent to rob, burglary, forgery, bribery, assault and battery on wife, bigamy, living in adultery, sodomy, incest, rape, miscegenation, crime against nature, or any crime punishable by imprisonment in penitentiary, or for any infamous crimes or crime involving moral turpitude; also, any person who has been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted as a vagrant or tramp, or of selling or offering to sell his vote or the vote of another, or of making or offering to make false returns in any election by the people or in any primary election to procure the nomination or election of any person to any office, or of suborning any witness or registrar to secure the registration of any person as an elector, provided that any person who is disqualified from voting by reason of conviction of any of the offenses mentioned in this section, except treason, whether the conviction was had in a state or federal court, has been pardoned, may be restored to his citizenship with right to vote by the governor, approved by the board of pardons and specially expressed in the pardon.

Sec. 7 1-2. The following persons and no others, who, if their place of residence shall remain unchanged, will have, at the date of the next general election, the qualifications as to residence prescribed by section 1 of this act, shall be qualified to register as electors, provided they shall not be disqualified under section 2 of this act:

1st. Those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who are physically unable to work; and those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who have worked or been regularly engaged in some lawful employment, business or occupation, trade or calling for the greater part of the twelve months next preceding the time they offer to register, and those who are unable to read and write, if such inability is due solely to physical disability; or,

2d. The owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of forty acres of land situate in this state, upon which they reside; or the owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of any woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of real estate situate in this state, assessed for taxation at the value of three hundred dollars or more or the owner in good faith, in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith, in her own right, of personal property in this state assessed for taxation for three hundred dollars or more; provided, that the taxes due upon such real or personal property for the year next preceding the year in which he offers to register shall have been paid, unless the assessment shall have been legally contested and is undetermined.

Sec. 15. Any elector who registered prior to January 1, 1903, who has changed the county of his residence shall be registered on application on production of his certificate, unless he has since become disqualified.

Sec. 16. When the certificate of any elector who was duly registered has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, on application stating that the certificate has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, and verified by affidavit, and it appears of record that such applicant has been registered, the judge of probate of the county of registration or the secretary of state shall issue to the applicant a certificate that he was duly registered as an elector. Such certificate shall be issued free of charge to the elector. The secretary of state shall at the expense of the state furnish the judge of probate blank certificates for use as provided in this section.

The certificate of the registrars or the judge of probate or of the secretary of state shall be sufficient to establish the fact of such registration.

Be sure and register when the registrars are in your beat, as the only excuse for not doing so is by reason of sickness of yourself or in your family, or by absence from the county. Everybody can register this summer who will be qualified by residence or age by the 8th day of November. Poll tax paying has nothing to do with registration; you can register now and pay your poll tax afterwards, but you can not vote unless you are both registered and have paid your poll tax (if any is due). The period of residence necessary to register is two years in the state, one year in the county, and three months in the beat. If you have moved from one beat to another in the county less than three months before election day, you can vote in your old beat, so you don't lose your vote by changing beats. Any one who desires to register on property qualification should take with him his last assessment sheet and tax collector's receipt to show to the registrars as proof that you are possessed of such property, and pay taxes on it. You can register under ANY of the following heads:

1. If you own 40 acres or more land in this state, and reside upon it.

2. If your wife owns 40 acres or more land in this state, upon which you reside.

3. If you own real estate in this state that is assessed for taxation at $300 or more.

4. If your wife owns real estate in this state assessed for taxation at $300 or more.

5. If you own personal property in this state assessed for taxation for $300 or more.

6. If your wife owns personal property in this state assessed for taxation for $300 or more.

7. If you can read and write any section of the constitution of the United States.

Don't give up your life certificate that you got in 1902; you only have to show it to the registrars in case you have moved to this county from some other county.

THE UNION will furnish any one information on any special points that they may be in doubt upon, and stands ready to help any one to get all the rights he is entitled to under the laws of Alabama. If you think you are entitled to register and the registrars should refuse you, take a couple of good men with you so you can have witnesses as to such refusal and the reasons given by the registrars, and thereby be enabled to take your case up to higher authority. tf

Want Two-Thirds Jury Law.

The Texas Bar association adopted a resolution calling on the legislature to submit a constitutional amendment to so change the jury law that a two-thirds majority of a jury may return a binding verdict in civil action. It is contended that such a change will prevent jury bribing and mistrials to a great extent.

General Harrison President.

Owing to a misunderstanding in the dates there were but a few in attendance at the reunion of the blue and the gray held in congress hall at the world's fair. General George P. Harrison, of Alabama, was elected president, and Rev. Dr. T. H. Haggerty, of St. Louis, secretary.

Officials of vegetarian societies are in high glee over the predicament of the meat eaters on account of the butchers' strike. They insist that the strike, instead of being a hardship, will prove ultimately a twofold blessing in educating the people to adopt their theories. Living expenses, they argue, will be greatly reduced thereby, and the health of the people vastly improved.

Unknown America.

abrador, the Lone Land of the North, Less Explored Than Africa.

By Willard Glazier.

HE fate of Leonidas Hubbard in Labrador leads me to present briefly some of the conditions which confront the explorer who has the hardihood to break from the coast and attempt exploration in the Labarador Peninsula—the vast Lone Land, which, although seen by the Cabots in 1497, is today less known than any other quarter of North America. The coast has been sailed by daring navigators for more than four hundred years, yet the t desolate, and forbidding mysteries of the interior still baffle the skill heroism for the adventurous pioneer who has the courage to face them.
This strange, rugged, and ice-fringed peninsula has an area equal to the ...da and South Atlantic States or of England, France, and Austria combined, ...erally. Labrador is forbidding, if not repulsive, and this condition, perhaps ...large measure, accounts for its having been so long neglected by American ...rers. From a scenic point of view, however, Labrador has much to offer. ...bays, islands, rivers, gigantic waterfalls and snow-capped mountains will ...ys prove intensely interesting to the tourist and student of nature who ...gets in the grand and picturesque.
The interior of Labrador has been found to be a tableland about 1,500 ...above sea level, the foothills of which reach down to the sea. Piercing ...e foothills at intervals along the 1,100 miles of coast line are deep inlets, ...of which resemble the fiords of Norway and Sweden.
Of these, perhaps the most striking is Nakvak, 1,100 miles north of St. ...e. This bay is between one and two miles in width and twenty miles ... Great towering cliffs more than 1,500 feet high jut out into the water ...ther hand. Glistening cascades tumble over their sides, and mystifying ...ms lure one to explore them.
It is hardly probable that the collapse of the Hubbard party will deter ...s from undertaking further exploration with similar purposes. Central ...rador is not nearly so well known as equatorial Africa, and the little ...dge possessed by geographers is chiefly derived from the unreliable ...ts of Eskimos, Indians and fur traders. These conditions are sufficient ...d others to attempt what Hubbard and Wallace failed to accomplish.
The lesson of their fate will hardly be ignored by those who follow them. ...Labrador explorer should not only be welll equipped, but shoud carry ...ient emergency rations to enable him to carry forward his work without ...sks. Guns and fishing tackle cannot be safely relied upon at certain ...ons for food supplies, and he who estimates differently will come to grief ...er or later.
Had Hubbard realized this the story of his undertaking would doubtless ...e had a less tragic ending. It is unfortunate indeed that so much hard... ...and privation was suffered without immediate benefit; but his experience ...prove a valuable object lesson to those who may plan to penetrate at some ...e day the wilds of the Labrador Peninsula.

CROP PROGRESS.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Climate and Crop Bulletin of the Weather Bureau—Alabama Section—For Week Ending July 25, 1904.

General Conditions.

The weather was generally favorable for growing and maturing crops, though too much rain was received in some southwestern and northern counties, and more is needed in a few southern and central counties. A hail storm, which passed over the middle portion of Coffee county on the evening of the 18th instant completly destroyed crops over an area of about four miles wide and 14 miles long; hail storms were also slightly damaging in Autauga, Marshall and DeKalb counties. A week of dry, moderately warm weather would be beneficial to field crops, nearly all of which have been laid by. Cotton continues to fruit well, though there are some complaints of too rapid growth and grassy fields. The crop as a whole, however, is generally promising, with but comparatively few reports of damaging conditions of any kind. Corn is generally promising, with the early planted maturing over the southern half of the state, where some early fodder is being pulled; late corn continues very promising in nearly all districts. Gardens and minor crops are making satisfactory progress, except sweet potatoes are blighting in some fields. Melons and peaches are plentiful; grapes and pears are rotting in some places, but continue generally promising. Hay prospects are now generally good and turnips have been sown in some localities.

Wreck on Southern.

In a freight wreck on the Southern railway at Patton's Mill, caused by the spreading of the rails, five persons were injured, two seriously; ten cars were wrecked and two engines belonging to the Central of Georgia railroad, being transported from the Baldwin locomotive works, were badly damaged.

The wreck blocked the line for seven hours. The most severely injured is John R. Snow, of Philadelphia, who was traveling as caretaker of the new engines. One of the wrecked cars leaving the track was thrown into a cottage near the right of way, and the timbers flying from the demolished porch of the house injured Miss Mollie Patton. Snow's condition is critical.

The blood-stained furniture and wardrobes of the late King Alexander and Queen Draga of Servia were publicly burned in the palace grounds by King Peter, who feared they might be used for political purposes if turned over to the sisters of the murdered queen.

Jesse Boyd, a 11-year-old boy, was visiting in West Point Miss., a few days ago, and while shooting sparrows with some playmates dropped his rifle over the fence and the weapon discharged. The 22-caliber bullet struck the boy in the heart, causing instant death.

TIRED OF LIFE.

Well Known Railroad Man Fatally Shoots Himself.

Capt. Daniel Fraser, a white man, committed suicide by shooting himself in the head with a pistol at the Western railway freight depot at Selma, Friday morning. He left a note stating he was tired of life and he hoped for a better life after this.

He was transfer clerk for the Western railroad up to a short time ago. He came to Selma from Opelika. He had held several important railroad positions and was well thought of. He had a daughter in Opelika, who had just telephoned him to come to that place where he had a home. He was about fifty years of age.

MUST HAVE STAMP.

State Text Book Law Held to be Constitutional.

The appeal of Dr. A. J. Dickinson in the noted text-book case was turned down by the supreme court affirming the validity of the state text-book law. Dr. Dickinson's contention was that his children had a right to use textbooks not bearing the state depository stamp, provided the books were otherwise identical with those prescribed by the text-book commission. The lower court decided against him and he appealed, the appeal being lost. The decision means that public school children must have books with the required stamp and these stamps will be affixed only to books sold in the official state depositories.

Will Work Prisoners.

Madison county commissioners are making arrangements to have the county convicts put at work on the county roads instead of hiring them to the state at 30 cents a day. Under the new system, prisoners will be allowed to work the roads before their trials and if they are not convicted they will be paid for their work. Otherwise they will be credited with the time on the sentences passed upon them.

Russia Will Not Search Ships.

Orders have been sent to the volunteer fleet steamers, St. Petersburg and Smolensk, to refrain from interference with foreign shipping.

It is expected the steamers will eventually join the Baltic fleet and be replaced by ordinary warships.

Great Britain's bill for damages against Russia for demurrage and other indemnities connected with the arrest, detention and shelling of British ships in the Red sea will probably be heavy. Already it is roughly estimated at $5,000,000.

TELLING HER GOODBY.

Somehow, can't keep back the sigh
When I'm tellin' her good-by!
Try to pull myself together—
Wish her joy an' pleasant weather—
Hope she'll lan' thar safe an' soun'.
But, good people, I'll be boun'
Ef the tears ain't in my eye
When I'm tellin' her good-by!

Sence she's got to go, I'm glad.
When it's over! an' half mad
That I can't keep in control
That upheavin' of my soul!
Whistle—try to sing a bit,
But thar ain't no heart in it,
Sun an' stars have left life's sky
When I'm tellin' her good-by!

That's the way with women! They
Steal yer heart, an' slip away,
Like some bright an' sunny beam
You've been seein' in a dream!
Jest the minute that you know
You air lovin' of 'em so!
Hope's done left me—life's a sigh—
I've been tellin' her good-by!

When Man Proposes.

"Do I look perfectly calm?" inquired Polly, climbing into the wrong side of the sleigh and trying to tuck the laprobe around the dashboard. "Because," she went on, beginning to take off her gloves, and then, as she re-collected herself, nervously drawing them on again, "though you might not suspect it, I'm—a little—excited. I've just finished getting proposed to."

I gave the check rein a violent jerk that must have insulted a horse like Marc Antony.

"I wouldn't even ask who—" I began.

"Oh, you needn't," said Polly. "It was only Bobby Paddington."

I started. The check rein slipped from my fingers, and I let the whip fall with a thud into the snow.

"Why, what is the matter?" asked Polly. "It isn't polite to be surprised when a girl gets proposed to. It looks as if you had thought she couldn't—"

"Oh, it isn't that," said I. Anybody could get proposed to by Bobby Paddington—and in leap year."

"Pooh!" said Polly, as I stepped into the sleigh and tucked the robe around her. "Leap year has nothing to do with it—nor Bobby Paddington, either—if a girl has really made up her mind. Leap year merely gives her a privilege which a woman can take whenever she likes. It's like the kiss under the mistletoe, entirely a joke. You wouldn't dare kiss any girl under the mistletoe whom you wouldn't dare kiss anywhere else. And no girl would think of asking a man to marry her on leap year, or at any other time—that is, no girl with a particle of common sense or delicacy."

"Or womanliness," I declared.

"Or knowledge of men," said Polly.

"Or breeding."

"Or experience."

"I wonder," said I, "if any woman ever did use that leap year privilege."

"Never," said Polly, "since she has had the every year privilege of making a man propose to her. It would have been so very unnecessary. Any woman who uses a little tact and sets out to can get a proposal. The difference between proposing herself and making a man propose to her is the difference between using a whip and spur. You don't have to whip a horse—that is, a horse worth having—do you? But you do often have to spur him when you come to a jump. A man is like a horse; he hates a whip, but he minds a spur."

"Oh, I see," said I, chuckling to Marc Antony until the sleigh sped over the frozen road; "a proposal is like a hedge. A fellow wants to get over it, but he is afraid of what is on the other side. He may land in a tangle—or he may get a cold water dousing."

"Or he fancies there might be a ditch somewhere."

"Or a trap," I suggested gently.

"Exactly," said Polly, "and that is why it needs a little mental suggestion from the girl to spur him on. If she attempts to drive him with a whip he balks. But mental suggestion——"

"That isn't anything like—hypnotism—is it, Polly?"

"Well—a little," acknowledged Polly. "It's making somebody think something that isn't so."

"Making him think that there isn't cold water on the other side?" I inquired.

"Yes, or a tangle," said Polly. "The average man dreads getting tangled up worse than he does plunging into cold water. But if you can hide all the cords of a binding engagement and all the bonds of matrimony, or can make them look like garlands, or cover them with silk and can persuade him that a proposal isn't a hedge at all, but just a bower of roses that he can slip over without any discomfort, and that the water on the other side couldn't possibly be cold, but just warm tears of affectionate sympathy, and that there aren't any ditches in which to be entombed alive, or any traps in which to be caught, and then can make him believe that you don't care whether he takes the leap or not—"

"He will go pell mell on to his doom," I finished tragically.

"Like Bobby Paddington," Polly giggled.

"Oh, Bobby Paddington," I remarked with disgust. "He is just like some fool horses that would take any hedge, if it was brick wall—and always land on their feet. There is a divine Providence that protects Bobby."

"I'm very sure you're very uncomplimentary," said Polly. "And, besides, Bobby Paddington landed right in the ice cold water this time. I refused him—as hard as I could."

I looked down at the demure little bundle of fur beside me, with one curl and a nose sticking out of the big collar.

"Did you do it for my sake, Polly?" I asked softly.

"No," said Polly, "for Bobby's. He needed the lesson. His conceit was something atrocious. Besides, I had made a sort of wager with Kitty Carter——" Polly stopped.

"Well?" I suggested.

"Oh, well—that I could—that he should—I mean—Oh, don't you understand, Mr. Heavyfeather—by twelve o'clock. I finished refusing him at five minutes of, while you were waltzing with——"

"How do you know with whom I as waltzing?"

"Oh, I had only to keep one eye and an ear on Bobby—and not my heart," said Polly sweetly.

I melted beneath Polly's smile, as the snow beneath the sun.

"Polly," said I, "tell me how you managed the mental suggestion in Bobby's case—how you managed it, anyhow."

"I began by telling him that the jam was in the closet, but that the door was locked."

"I don't understand," said I.

"I told him," said Polly, "that I never intended to marry, never!"

I jerked the reins so suddenly that Marc Antony threatened to stand up on his hind legs.

"What did you tell him that for?" I exclaimed.

"Bobby would hate to think anybody who was in the matrimonial market had entangled him," explained Polly. "He likes to think he is pursuing somebody who doesn't want him. That's the funny thing about most men. They always want the girl who they think doesn't want them, and thereby lay the foundation for the divorce court proceedings right there in the parlor where the proposal is going on. It is nearly always safe to begin making a man propose to you by telling him you are unattainable. It is like telling a small boy that there is a jelly cake in the pantry, but that it's locked up. He immediately begins to look for the pantry key."

"Polly," said I, gazing down upon that small bundle of fur with real awe in my eyes, "are you sure you aren't a reincarnation of Plato—or Socrates—or somebody? For an unreasonable little person you can reason better——"

"Oh, it didn't come naturally," laughed Polly. "It's the result of—well, you might say long experience."

I winced. I was searching my memory; and somewhere, at some time, it slowly occurred to me, Polly had positively vowed to me confidentially that she never intended to marry.

"Oh, I see," I remarked, as the light dawned on me, "you always say that, just as you say, 'Charmed to meet you,' when you're introduced, 'Come again,' when a man leaves the house, or 'Pardon me,' when you step on his toes."

"No-o-o," said Polly, "you wouldn't dare tell a timid man that the pantry door was locked. He might take you literally and go away frightened or discouraged. And I told you that I didn't treat them all alike by any means."

"Well," I remarked, flipping Marc Antony quite unnecessarily, "what did you do next as regards Bobby?"

"I don't remember. Let me see—oh, yes. I believe I pointed out to him why I wouldn't marry, but what a perfectly charming wife somebody was missing; and how entirely ideal marriage between two sympathetic souls could be made, and how awful it would be if a man should marry the wrong girl; and——"

I leaned over and looked Polly squarely in the face.

"Did you say all those things, Polly Lee?" I demanded.

"Look out!" cried Polly. "That's the second time you've almost driven into a snowdrift."

"Polly Lee," I repeated, "did you say all those things?"

"Why of course not, silly!" said Polly, turning pink. "I only suggested them. My words were quite—well, he never would remember the words, anyhow, so they don't count."

"Well, what does count, anyway?" I retorted, flipping Marc Antony spitefully.

"The looks," said Polly, "and the tone and the attitude."

I gave Marc Antony the first lash he ever had.

"What attitude, Miss Lee?" I asked in a cold, hard voice.

"The mental attitude," answered Polly, without the quiver of an eyelash, "and the mental atmosphere. Oh, it's something you can't explain, but most girls understand it. It's just like feminine logic. There isn't any explanation, and you can't prove it, but it's true, just the same."

"There is," said I, "just about $5 difference between feminine logic and masculine logic."

"I don't understand," said Polly.

"I mean," said I, "that there is five dollars difference between Bobby Paddington's logic and your logic."

"Please explain," pouted Polly. "You're always so intricate."

"For instance," I went on, "when Bobby Paddington bet me five dollars this morning that he would carry his flirtation with you to the point of proposing within twenty-four hours——"

"Mr. Heavyfeather," exclaimed Polly, sitting up perfectly straight. "You don't—mean to say—Bobby Paddington knew I was engaged to you!"

"Oh, yes; I told him all about that only this morning," I replied, nonchalantly.

Polly was looking straight ahead of her with flaming cheeks and snapping eyes.

"And, as I remarked to you," I went on, slipping my arm across the back of the sleigh and glancing sidewise at Polly, "Bobby Paddington would take any sort of a hedge, even if he knew it was a brick wall."

Polly didn't even notice my arm. As she leaned back into the depths of it and the sleigh, with a long breath, there were tears of mortification in her eyes.

"Then," she said, looking pathetically up at me, "he was only flirting—with me—all the—time."

"Polly, dear," said I, bending over and kissing the top of the fur cap softly, "and what were you doing?"

THE TONKAWAS.

Story of Tribe Is a Sad One in Indian Annals.

While the early history of the Tonkawa Indians is wrapped in mystery, a legend exists that at an early period the earth was covered with Tonkawas; that a great flood came and scattered the tribes, which were never able to come together again. The home of the Tonkawa was the Wichita mountain country, which now constitutes south central Oklahoma. At least, the Wichita mountain country is the first authentic location to which civilization has traced the Tonkawa and to which the oldest living members of the tribe date back their knowledge of their ancestral habitat. The Tonkawa, or Nez Perces, reserve, which is made up of four townships adjoining the Ponca reservation, and where the tribes settled in 1880 under the leadership of the renowned Chief Joseph, was so thoroughly distasteful to them that in the early spring of 1885 they went to their northern home in Montana, later locating at Spalding, Idaho. During the great civil conflict the Tonkawas remained neutral, their attitude bringing upon them the hatred of the Comanches, Caddoes, Wichitas, Delawares, Shawnees and Kickapoos, who combined in efforts to wipe out the entire nation of Tonkawas.

When the Tonkawas were first found by the European explorers and the historians they were the most powerful nation of Indians in the Southwest of the main continent of America, a fact which tends to throw some light on the legend they so respect concerning the time when the earth was covered with Tonkawas. At this time the Tonkawas were the only Indians with any start toward advancement and civilization, and theirs as a crude advancement—in advance of civilization. They understood the art of weaving cloth, for which they used a species of silk weed bark fibre, and they kept historic and religious records by strands of beads, which by their variety were made to convey information to the seclusive set of professors who were bound to reveal the truth and always read aright—for if they should add to or take any part away of the subject of this bead history they would suffer the penalty of death.

The most extreme law of the Tonkawas—and one that has puzzled students of human nature and historic customs—was their law of marriage and divorce, any infringement of which was punishable by cutting off the ears for the first offence, cutting off the nose for the second and by death for the third offence. A grown man who did not do his share of work in the little maize tracts was denied the right to marry.

Numbering about 1,000 souls, the Tonkawas have remained since 1885 in Idaho, near Spalding. About one mile from the agency proper in Oklahoma can be seen a small inclosure dotted with scores of little mounds—the resting place of the Nez Perces dead, large and small, who lie buried two and three in a grave, a mark which commemorates the scourge that played sad havoc with the Nez Perces one winter during their short stay in Oklahoma.—Kansas City Journal.

The "Pitch Lake King."

Conrad F. Stollmeyer, known as the "Pitch Lake King," and the wealthiest man in the Caribbeans, is dead at Port of Spain, Trinidad, aged ninety-one years. Though a penniless German immigrant to the United States, he became the editor of a German paper in Philadelphia, which pro-slavery partisans tried to wreck in 1845. Again penniless, he became an adventurer in Trinidad, and finally the owner of an asphalt lake worth millions, which he discovered. Stollmeyer, although born in Germany, where he received a university education, was a British subject, having been naturalized by a special act of Parliament in 1848.

A SERMON FOR SUNDAY

AN ELOQUENT DISCOURSE ENTITLED "THE INDUSTRIAL CONFLICT."

The Rev. John D. Long Gives Some Wholesome Advice About Present-Day Problems—The Causes of Discontent and the Remedies.

BABYLON, L. I.—In the old First Presbyterian Church here, Sunday morning, the Rev. John D. Long, pastor, preached on "The Industrial Conflict." The text was from Ecclesiastes ii:22: "What hath a man for all his labor?" Mr. Long said:

The writer of this text was asking as to the rewards of life. Let us accommodate it to the conflict now waging between capital and labor. "It is the old question of the laborer and his hire. What are the teachings of Holy Writ on the question?

Here, as elsewhere, we believe that the Gospel applies, for as Ruskin suggests, the Gospel beams upon life at every point, and is either good for everything or good for nothing.

Civilization is based upon labor—human, animal, mechanical. What we call capital is at bottom only accumulated labor. The day laborer lays brick in a wall; that is labor. He saves up a part of his wage, and that becomes capital. Mechanical labor, by which most of the world's work is now done, is human labor invested in machinery, and working through the same.

Of course, money or capital is secured not only through saving and invention, but in many other ways; yet human effort is back of it all, and it becomes a sort of call loan upon the bank of labor. Was it not Emerson who said, "He that hath a dollar is master of all to the extent of that dollar?"

Vast fortunes have been piled up by those who have invented machines by which mechanism may take the place of human hands. Thus the inventor is enabled to draw the wages of thousands. We all know how largely the machine has superseded the naked hand in the manufacture of a thousand and one articles of daily use. Take, for example, pins and needles and nails.

To be sure, many great fortunes have been made by other means than by machinery, but in the main the wealth of modern times is founded upon mechanical labor.

Before asking what the letter or spirit of the Bible teaches on the labor question, let us face the situation of to-day. Organized labor and capital are in conflict. There are strikes and rumors of strikes. Each strike is a battle in the war.

It may be well to observe that organized labor has as yet only a fraction of the total labor army, but it is a fraction that is increasing.

Why this warfare? Because labor on the one hand is dissatisfied with its share of the rewards of industry, and because, on the other, capital constantly seeks to reduce the cost of production by opposing the demands of labor.

Other factors, however, enter into the situation. One arises from the development of the modern corporation. Whether corporations have souls or not, they lack in large measure the element of personality and the personal touch. Men who work for a corporation are working in the main for an unknown entity. Now, we remember that among the old-time Romans the word for stranger was also the word for enemy.

Further, there has been much dishonesty in corporate dealings. Take such things as the corrupt purchase of public franchises below value, the increase in cost of certain necessities of life by reason of unjust combinations to keep up prices. These and other similar crimes against the community have done much to inflame not only labor, but the general public against capital.

Also, the rising standard of life, by which the living wage gets further and further from the meagre pittance that would suffice to support the frugal Chinaman, leads the laborer to constantly demand a more and more generous wage.

Still other grounds of hostility might be referred to, such as the natural, though sinful, envy of the rich by the poor; the ostentatious luxury of the rich, the growth of class distinctions between the poor and the rich and the inequality of pecuniary rewards. The men who discovered the priceless boon of anesthesia—who found that surgery might be rendered painless by the use of such agents as chloroform and ether—gained but little money from their discoveries. They doubtless might have traded on the world's fear of pain, and by using the patent laws and secrecy secured wealth beyond the dreams of avarice, but to their honor they did not. On the other hand, the men who introduced such improved and cheapened methods as the Bessemer process of producing steel gained money by the hundred millions. So people are tempted to ask, "Have not some men been rather selfish, to say the least, in the acquisition of their wealth? And may they not have obtained a little more than their share?"

Before we go further let us ask what is to be the probable outcome of the war between labor and capital? Is it an irrepressible conflict, or can the opposing interests be reconciled? The answer is already being given. Take such a situation as may now be seen in the coal trade of Chicago. After bitter fighting the dealers and the teamsters have come together to monopolize the coal trade of the city and keep out all competition. Wages and profits have been put up at the expense of the outside public. This is likely to go on more and more.

The ultimate outcome, unless the tendency is checked, will be organization all along the line until we have collectivism—a vast organized machine, in which men will be cogs and individual initiative and personality will be restricted to an extent that will largely arrest the progress of civilization.

But let us take a breath and turn to the Bible. What are the teachings of the Bible in regard to labor and wealth? The Old Testament is plainly anti-capitalistic. In proof of this you have but to read the laws regarding capital in the Book of Leviticus—laws that, if enforced, would compel plain living as surely as the iron coin of Sparta. Hear what was laid down there. Land was allotted in small parcels to the families of the tribes, and could not be alienated except for the term of fifty years. "And ye shall hallow this fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof; it shall be a jubilee unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family." (Leviticus xxv:10).

Interest could not be charged on loans. "And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee; then thou shalt relieve him; yea, though he be a stranger or a sojourner; that he may live with thee. Thou shalt not lend him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase." (Leviticus xxv:35-6).

Finally, there was the statute of limitations with reference to loans. "At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release. And this is the manner of the release; every creditor that lendeth aught unto his neighbor shall release it." (Deuteronomy xv:1-2).

The attitude of the Old Testament toward wealth is perhaps best reflected in the prayer of Agur—"Give me neither poverty nor riches * * * lest I be full, and deny Thee, and say, Who is the Lord? or lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain." (Proverbs xxx:8-9).

I need hardly remind you that the great character dominating every page of the New Testament was a poor man, without house or home. His attitude toward labor on the one hand and capital on the other may be imagined. It is well put by Dr. Henry J. Van Dyke:

"Never in a costly palace did I rest on golden bed,
Never in a hermit's cavern have I eaten idle bread.
Born within a lowly stable, where the cattle round Me stood,
Trained a carpenter in Nazareth, I have toiled and found it good.
They who tread the path of labor follow where My feet have trod;
They who work without complaining do the holy will of God.
Where the many toil together, there am I among My own;
Where the tired workman sleepeth, there am I with him alone.
I, the peace that passeth knowledge, dwell amid the daily strife.
I, the bread of heaven, am broken in the sacrament of life."

While there is never any bitterness in the Master's utterance regarding wealth, His views may be readily gathered from such parables as that of Dives and Lazarus (Luke xvi:19).

Again, we have the same attitude in the passage on the camel and the needle's eye (Matthew xix:23).

Not only was the Lord poor, but His apostles were all poor men, who placed no value on wealth. Paul, the greatest of apostolic preachers, supported himself by manual labor, and taught "They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction and perdition. For the love of money is the root of all evil" (I. Timothy vi:9-10). On the whole, the attitude of the New Testament is one of warning against the seductions of wealth.

The evangelical churches stand upon the word of Scripture, and so in sympathy with labor. In fact, of some 7,000,000 of male members in the evangelical churches of our land, not less than 6,000,000 are wage earners or manual laborers. So that the claim that the modern church has departed from the position occupied by the apostolic church is not well founded.

What, then, from the letter and spirit of the Bible in connection with the teachings of experience is to be suggested as a means of curing the quarrel between labor and capital?

First, let there be closer personal relations between the rich and the poor. Let them meet together in the fellowship of God's house and the Divine Fatherhood. Out of mutual acquaintance will come mutual respect, and a recognition of a common humanity.

You may remember Emerson's story of the quarrel between the mountain and the squirrel, where he says:

"The mountain and the squirrel
Had a quarrel,
And the former called the latter 'Little prig.'
Bun replied,
'You are doubtless very big.
But all sorts of things and weather
Must be taken in together
To make up a year
And a sphere
And I think it no disgrace
To occupy my place.
If I'm not as large as you,
You are not so small as I;
And not half so spry.
I'll not deny you make
A very pretty squirrel track.
Talents differ, all is well and wisely put;
If I cannot carry forests on my back,
Neither can you crack a nut."

Then there should be a deeper interest taken by capital in the financial well-being of labor. Such devices as profit sharing, old age pensions and the like will give the workman a sense of greater security and of partnership with capital.

Interest taken in the proper housing of labor, although not always appreciated, is in the right line. So, too, the introduction of the social secretary as an intermediary between the corporation and the employe.

Another thing needed, not so much in the interests of labor or capital, but in the interests of the innocent non-combatants, is compulsory arbitration, applied at least where the public suffers intolerable inconvenience, as in the case of a railroad, telegraph or coal strike. Compulsory arbitration may not always be satisfactory to the combatants, but it is essential to the peace and comfort of those not involved in the controversy. This remedy, or military control, as in the recent railway strikes in Holland and Austria, should be used to protect the public.

The sovereign remedy, however, must be not by recourse to legal means, but by the application of the royal law. James (ii:8), after speaking of the relations between the rich and the poor, says: "If ye fulfill the royal law according to the Scripture, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, ye do well." This is the aqua regia, the royal solvent, in which we may solve all the hard asperities of conflicting interests.

Only as men come to know God through Christ, whom He has sent, and so come to love their fellow men, will it be possible to solve these questions of controversy in a way that will insure the permanent progress of our civilization.

What we need, after all, is not measures, but men.

"The world wants men—large hearted, manly men;
Men who shall join in chorus and prolong
The psalm of labor and of love.
The age wants heroes—heroes who shall dare
To struggle in the solid ranks of truth;
To clutch the monster, error, by the throat;
To bear opinion to a loftier seat;
To blot the error of oppression out,
And lead a universal freedom in."

Faces That Comfort One.

"I wish some people knew just how much their faces can comfort one!" The speaker was a young woman who had passed through deep sorrows; she was telling a friend how many people comforted her, though they were unconscious of it. The Epworth Herald tells the story. "I often ride down in the same street car with your father, and it has been such a help to me to sit next to him. There is something so good and strong and kind about him, it has been a comfort just to feel he was beside me. Sometimes, when I have been utterly depressed and discouraged, he has seemed somehow to know just the right word to say to me; but, if he didn't talk, why I just looked at his face, and that helped me. He probably has not the least idea of it, for I know him so slightly, and I don't suppose people half realize, anyway, how much they are helping or hindering others!" There is a great deal of this unconscious kindness in the world. Moses wist not that his face shone. The best people are not aware of their goodness. According to the old legend, it was only when it fell behind him, where he could not see it, that the saintly man's shadow healed the sick. This is a parable. Goodness that is aware of itself has lost much of its charm. Kindnesses that are done unconsciously mean the most.

Deception.

The one who successfully deceives another makes it hard for himself afterward when the deception shall have been discovered—as it is sure to be in time. He will always be distrusted, no matter whether he is again attempting deception or not. The only method that wins clear to the end is honesty.—Wellspring.

The "Bans" Forbidden.

We forbid the bans between rum, religion and politics of whatever party and whatever sect, and in the name of God and humanity, we proclaim a union new and indissoluble, of affection as well as of interest, between temperance, religion and politics of every party and every shade.—Neal Deal.

THE KNIGHT OF THE GOLDEN HAIR

The sun rolled up from an east of red,
The world was fresh and fair,
When summoned loud from his truckle bed,
The Knight of the Golden Hair.
They garbled him stout in his doubled worn,
They laced his scarlet shoon,
And forth he strode in the dimpling morn,
And called for his trusty spoon.

His trenche- he scraped in minutes ten ('Twas a bowl of mush, I wis,
But faith and forsooth, the best of men
Have flourished on fare like this),
Then away, away, for he could not stay;
Good-by to the breakfast board;
A thousand ventures abroad by day
Were waiting his knightly sword.

He vanquished many a wily foe,
And hacked him limb from limb
Ah! tiger and lion he laid full low
In the depths of the woodshed grim.
In all the waste of the yard was naught
He did not bravely dare;
Dragons and giants and trolls he sought,
This Knight of the Golden Hair.

At last when the West with pink was soft,
And the sun rode high no more,
He captive fell to a spell he oft
Had battled in vain before.
Assailed by a host of drowsy charms
He yielded to magic deep,
And locked secure in his mother's arms,
Was seized by the wizard Sleep.

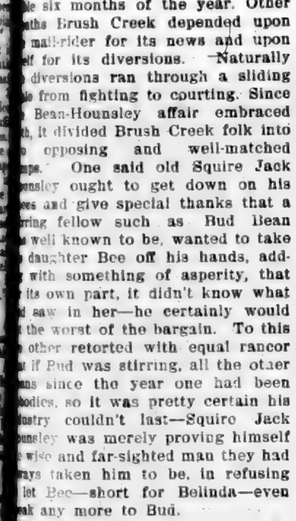
The circus tent was patched and ow, barely big enough for one , with a disreputable fly for the dozen cages which made up the agerie, yet everybody felt the cir- itself a providence, coming, as it just the week that the quarrel xist the Beans and the Hounsleys near the shooting pitch.

Clingstone, the social center of all sh Creek, lay where the big road ssed the river, which was navi- le six months of the year. Other ths Brush Creek depended upon mail-rider for its news and upon lf for its diversions. Naturally diversions ran through a sliding le from fighting to courting. Since Bean-Hounsley affair embraced h, it divided Brush Creek folk into o opposing and well-matched ps. One said old Squire Jack unsley ought to get down on his es and give special thanks that a ring fellow such as Bud Bean well known to be, wanted to take daughter Bee off his hands, add- with something of asperity, that its own part, it didn't know what saw in her—he certainly would the worst of the bargain. To this other retorted with equal rancor if Bud was stirring, all the other ns since the year one had been odies, so it was pretty certain his ntry couldn't last—Squire Jack unsley was merely proving himself wise and far-sighted man they had ays taken him to be, in refusing let Bee—short for Belinda—even ak any more to Bud.

That was the talk, understand, in n-planting time. By August, the rvus season, it was very much sharp- and more sulphurous, Kind people, er their habit, had carried things k and forth between the high con- ding parties, until Squire Jack was dy to foam at the mouth if you d Bean in his hearing, and Bud llowed hard, and looked intently r your head if you so much as ntioned that Squire Jack had ded horses again.

The circus came to Clingstone. That ent the coming in of everybody



Jump—but don't holler when you hear the lion roar."

e within a radius of twenty miles. ingstone housewives began cooking e day after the bills were put up, d when the day itself came, had eir tables set at eleven o'clock. quire Jack brought in every soul on e place, all packed in the two horse agon, along with a sack of meal, and her sacks of cabbage, potatoes and ples. The sacks were all for his ster Jenny, at whose house he would are his women folks to gossip and dinner, while he himself kept a arp lookout for that pestilent Bud an.

Squire Jack meant to get there so ng ahead of Bud that Bud would ve no chance to find out Bee's hereabouts. It nettled him not a ttle that as he came to the ford the erryman said, grinning: "My soul, quire Jack! Looks like your chas- r Bud Bean. He's jest about two inutes ahead.' Bee, who was pale and pretty, with dreamy meek blue eye, smiled hopefully—it was a good omen, Bud's getting thus ahead of Pap. He had sent her a message the night before, mysterious as it was laconic, "Jump—but don't holler when you hear the lion roar," it ran. Bee did not in the least understand it—but then it was not for her to understand things—she meant always to leave that to Bud.

Still she could not help speculating on it, when she was safe in her seat inside the tent, and had seen Bud go past twice or three times without so much as looking her way. Somehow he seemed to be chumming mightily with the circus folk—he went in and out at pleasure, sat for brief whiles where he chose, and guyed the clown with a familiar ease really astounding.

Bee sat dreaming all through the performance, waiting for something—she did not know what. Her heart sank as the family party filed out of the tent, and still she had no sign from Bud. She thought her father was going straight home. That was Squire Jack's intention—but he had traded horses three times that day, getting boot and a better horse every time, so he was in the humor for any sort of pleasant extravagance. When he heard the ringmaster shouting from his perch on a gay wagon, that the night show would be unlike and ever so much better than the day one, he thrust a fistful of silver inside the ticket window, saying with a grim laugh: "I'm willin' to pay money jest to find out how slick you fellers can lie."

Bee felt her dying hope suddenly reprieved then, but she was near crying when the night show ended, and still Bud had made no sign. Bee was glad the mules trotted their best and made the wagon jounce and bounce so there could be no talking—Lize Pardue had come with them, and she knew was fairly aching to twit her with Bud's open falling away.

Squire Jack had distanced most of the other homing vehicles, when all at once one corner of the wagon sank down, spilling the occupants in a long row, before the team could be checked. A lynch-pin had dropped out and let the hind wheel run off. As Squire Jack was searching for it, lantern in hand, a man came galloping towards him, shouting aloud: "Run, everybody, for your lives! The lion's loose! Cage got turned over! Run He'll kill you! Run!"

The road ran through the woods. From the depths of them behind the rider there came a succession of blood-curdling howls. The Squire rose to the emergency. He had his horse—the new horse, in charge of Tommy, his eldest son. He also had the two mules—and nine people to carry off on them. In a wink he had stripped the mules of gear, set Tommy astride one of them, with his wife behind the lad, and little Sue, his youngest daughter on before. Beck mule, he knew, would save them if anything could—she was both sure-footed and speedy. He was not so certain about Tige, Beck's partner, still there was nothing for it but to back on her, boy Billy, Lize and brother Johnny, both of whom outyelled the lion. That left Bee, and her Aunt Maria, the most fearful soul alive, for riders behind upon the new horse. The Squire mounted the beast, clucked to him, and got him near the remaining hind wheel, which Aunt Maria had mounted and to which she clung despairingly. Aunt Maria weighed two hundred, and stood five foot two. Is it any wonder that when the Squire checked up at the end of two breathless miles, Bee, who should have been perched behind Aunt Maria, was nowhere visible?

Or is it any marvel that some two hours later, a minister in the country town was reading the marriage service in behalf of a disheveled bride, and an exultant groom. When the knot was tied hard and fast as law and gospel could do it, there was supper, very late, and very merry, at the town's finest hotel. The circus proprietor gave it—he was, it turned out, a running Bean, Bud's elder brother, who had run away many years before, in the wake of a circus. He had worked his way up, and at last became so indispensable that when the proprietor died his last words to his weeping widow were: "Stick to the country circuit—and don't forget to marry Bean." Bean, a born showman, did not in the least mind sinking his name out of hearing for the good of his son, but some stirrings of either affection or curiosity had made him write to Bud and find out how the land lay, before the "Second-Greatest-Show" came to Clingstone.

As for details—they were never quite clear to anybody. Lize Pardue maintains to this day that Bee was such a fool she simply fell off the horse and lay there, uncertain as to whether she was to be eaten or married. The story, of course, got into the papers, and helped the show to draw so well that at the end of the next season the proprietors sent to a very new and very pink Bean a silver loving cup with roaring lions for handles. Stranger still, Squire Jack Hounsley drank egg-nogs out of that same loving cup—and in drinking washed down the last trace of enmity toward his son-in-law.

IS ENTHUSIASTIC OVER GOLF.

Justice Harlan Ascribes Good Health to Popular Game.

One of the most enthusiastic of all those who follow the elusive golf balls over the Chevy Chase links near Washington is Justice Harlan of the United States Supreme Court. He has turned three score and ten, but he declines to agree that he has therefore passed what some have called the "dead line" of active life.

"I am no older than I was twenty years ago," he remarked the other day, "and while I can keep up my golf I'm apt to stay so."

Justice Harlan, after his first lesson in trying to make the ball do things it apparently did not wish to do, described golf as a "cross between tiddly-winks and a mile run," but to-day he plays, rain or shine, summer or winter, matching off with generals or diplomats or, failing these, "Colonel Bogey" himself.

Not long ago, in a pause in a session of the Supreme Court, the gallery saw Justice Harlan write something on a bit of paper and, calling a page, send it down to former Attorney General Griggs, who, himself an ardent golfer, was at the time before the tribunal about to plead a case. In such a room, in such a presence, everything becomes impressive, but that note merely read:

"Dear Griggs: I was out before breakfast this morning and played a white ball against a red one—the red man against the paleface. And the Injun won—two up. H."—New York Tribune.

Woman's Wise Use of Money.

A Long Island City school teacher, who has fallen heir to $100,000, announces that she will continue to teach and hopes to be more efficient than before.

"In fact, my money will help me in my work," she says, "and I shall spend some of it for that purpose. I am going to build a nice little home with part of the money, where I can be handy to the school and give more time to it than I have given previously."

Wise woman! Nine people out of ten would allow sudden acquisition of riches to end their usefulness.

In Chicago.

Ex-Senator "Billy" Mason says that a friend of his in Chicago was recently showing an acquaintance from the East through his art gallery.

"You have some pretty fine paintings here," remarked the Eastern man. "I especially like those old portraits. I presume they were handed down to you by your ancestors," he added, by way of a gentle "jolly."

"Ancestors nothing!" exclaimed the Chicago man, taking the matter seriously; "they were handed down to me by an auctioneer!"—June Woman's Home Companion.

His Letter.

When Willie Blank was at the seashore last summer his father wrote to him frequently, and in each letter inclosed ten cents or a quarter to add to the little lad's pleasure. Willie was no letter-writer, but one day he managed to compose the following comprehensive epistle, which he sent to his father:

"Deare Papa—I got all your leters and you have put some munny in each one of them. Please write oftener. Your luving son, William."

GOOD WORK OF FILIPINOS.

Faithful and Industrious in an Unaccustomed Climate.

Sixty Filipinos on the United States cable ship Burnside did excellent work on the rough seas off the coast of Alaska last year. Twenty of them were detailed for laying and repairing cables. They were thus engaged for three months, during which time they experienced a great deal of rough weather, one voyage having been so trying that the Burnside narrowlly escaped destruction. The Filipinos, however, in spite of the severe climate and the difficult nature of the work, proved so efficient and trustworthy that Lieut.-Col. Allen of the United States signal corps says in his official report: "The work was always cheerfully performed by them, and in no case during the entire trip was any sort of punishment administered to these men. They continually grew in strengtah, and with the exception of slight colds from exposure they were in excellent health throughout. The point desired to be made prominent is that these men taken from the Philippine islands and sent directly into the cold of Alaska were able to perform all the duties required of them in the most satisfactory manner.' Gen. Greely says: 'The marked success of the past year has caused the chief signal officer of the army to engage a Filipino crew for the operations in Alaskan waters for the coming summer."

SHE GOT THEM MIXED.

Explanation Dawned Rapidly on Mind of Housewife.

A lady walked into a grocer's shop one day with her sleeves turned up to her elbows and a fighting light in her eyes. "This ere," she observed with a sniff, as she banged a piece of yellowy substance on the counter, "is the soap that does the washin' of itself; the soap what makes ev'ry washin' day a kind of glorified bean feast; the soap what gits all the linen as white as snow and as sweet as a hazlenut by dinner time, and lets the happy housewife spend the rest of the day playin' with the children, and here am I been scrubbin' three mortal hours with that lump, and ain't got so much lather out of it as I could git from a brickbat." "I beg your pardon," remarked the grocer, "but it isn't the soap. Your little boy came in here yesterday for half a pound of both soap and cheese; that's the cheese."

"The cheese!" gasped the lady. "That accounts for the other thing, then."

"The other thing?" queried the grocer.

"Yes, the other thing," came the reply, "I was layin' awake half the night wonderin' what it was made the Welsh rabbit we had for supper taste so funny."—Kansas City Independent.

Kate Sanborn Queries.

After speaking of vast piles of decaying carcasses of the herons, slain for their plumes and the thousands of young birds left to starve, all for the sake of securing the plumes for women's hats, Mr. Scott says: "I wish clearly to emphasize the fact that I do not blame the women who use these decorations, for men are the responsible parties. No woman ever wore a decoration of any kind, much less the feather of a bird, for her own pleasure, or to attract the attention of other women. The object for which women wear decorations is to enhance their attractiveness and beauty to men, not to themselves, or to each other. And as long as men care to have women's hats decorated with feathers and express their approval by admiration bestowed, just so long will the custom endure."

Does Mr. Scott know women as well as he does birds?—From her article in National Magazine.

Play you Are the Sunshine.

You say you're feeling blue, lad?
That things are going wrong?
If that's the case for true, lad,
Cheer up and sing a song.
You'll find 'twill always pay, lad,
For all—for me and you
To play we are the sunshine
And let the skies be blue.
When the skies are blue and clear, lad,
The world is at its best;
Whene'er you drop a tear, lad,
It saddens all the rest.
Smile on—don't mind the knocks, lad,
Just keep your own heart true—
Play you're the golden sunshine
And let the sky be blue.
When you are feeling blue, lad,
And half inclined to cry,
You're at the job—'tis true, lad—
Intended for the sky.
The sunshine role sits bettter
On husky chaps like you—
Then be a human sunbeam,
Let but the sky be blue.

Long Term of Faithful Service.

On Tuesday, May 10, Prof. Charles Koetl completed his fiftieth year as organist of St. Mary's Catholic church in Ottumwa, Iowa. His compensation has always been small. He began with a little melodeon and it is said that he has never omitted a mass, vespers or benediction at which he had promised to play. He is now 69 years of age.

In a Profitless Chase.

In regard to the British operations in Somaliland the London Telegraph said recently: "Our chase of the mad mullah has lasted longer than the chase of Dewet and we have not caught him yet. Our troops have done their best in a region which produces nothing and has defied all attempts to make it grow laurels."

Resigns from Brown Faculty.

Mr. Delaney has served the college in the capacity of steward since 1885 and is well known to Brown men throughout the country. He will be succeeded by E. A. Burlingame, a civil engineer of Providence.

Goes Back to Nature

A son of a Portland (Ore.) physician has created a sensation by the startling method of living which he has adopted and which he advises all to adopt who desire perfect health. He advocates a return to the primitive way of living without clothing.

Ernest W. Darling, son of Dr. J. W. Darling, is the man who advocates the return to ways primeval. Until a year ago he lived in Portland, but was compelled to seek a sunnier clime on account of his health. For the last year he has lived on the summit of a hill on the outskirts of Los Angeles, Cal. He does not occupy a house, nor even a tent. The sole habitation is about seven by four feet and two feet in depth. In that peculiar place, wrapped in blankets, he seeks rest. He is an ardent lover of nature and believes that by his method of living he is able to commune more closely with its invisible forms and at the same time build up his constitution, which was shattered by disease.

"Good health is the first requisite for religion or anything else," he says, when questioned concerning his novel ideas. "I firmly believe that if we take perfect care of our health, avoiding all accidents or disease, we shall live eternally in these bodies of ours. Every person should learn gradually to live outdoors and to live on natural food—that is, food just as it comes from the hand of nature. Personally I prefer the fruit of the tropics—bananas, persimmons, figs, dates—which have been proved to give as great strength and endurance as does any mixed diet.

"The objects in living on natural food are:

"First—To make us more natural in thought and in action.

"Second — From an economical standpoint, it is far cheaper where these fruits grow. It is well known by travelers in the tropics that we can live on $1 a month or less.

"Third—There is a very decided humaniatrian issue in this diet. No animal has to suffer imprisonment and final slaughter in order to feed the fruitarian. The fruitarian will take his meal directly from the tree and eat."

Mr. Darling has evidently found these results in his mode of life, for he has built himself up wonderfully. When he left Portland a year ago he weighed ninety pounds, while now he weighs about one hundred and seventy-five pounds. It was done without a drop of medicine.

He rises at daylight, takes a cold shower bath, then runs half a mile or so. Then he goes through calisthenic exercises before eating breakfast of fruit. He eats regularly three times each day and always has a good appetite.

Flagged by a Cow

"Those people sleeping comfortably back in the Pullmans little know how often the engineer grasps the air brake valve thinking that the next minute his widow and fatherless children will be eligible to participate in the division of the Carnegie hero fund," said the fat engineer. "In most cases there's no cause for alarm, but my hair has stood on end so often that it has fallen out and now I'm totally blind.

"One night last week I was coming east on No. 44, and, though I do say it myself, we were hititng the trail at a rate that would make the Empire State express look like a stationary engine. I was pretty sure we'd come under the wire on time all right, when out of the gloom ahead suddenly flashed a red light comin' at me wavin' violently at right angles with the track—the usual flag signal.

"Hem," I says to myself, "another freight hog laid down ahead, and it's up to us to do the Good Samaritan act and push 'em out. Gettin' a train over this pike on time makes that stunt of the camel goin' through the needle's eye look like falling out of a hay loft. But why in goldarnation don't that wooden headed flagman step out of the middle of the track and let us pass? He can take the steps on the tank when we go by and tell me what's the matter.

But nothing must do but we stop dead and lose more time, for the object behind the red light was still comin' up the center of the track with the lantern swingin' viciously. I'd have to stop dead or run over the cuss.

"By this time I was 'most ready to take passage in an aerial grayhound, and I made the mistake of reversin' her to avoid hittin' the man. Bang! went the cylinder head on the right side.

"With the noise of the explosion the thing behind the red light gave a jump and cleared both tracks, landin' in a ditch. I knew that no human bein' could make a leap like that, so I started to investigate.

"And what do you suppose I found in the ditch? A cow. A cow with her crumpled horn passed through the ball of a red order lantern. Evidently she had broken through some farm fence a little further down the line and in rubbing her nose against an order lamp had stuck her horn through the lantern on the post and brought it away with her.

"And there we were for an hour while I disconnected and got the engine fixed up so we could move on slowly, using one side."

They "Buck the Tiger"

In Butte, Mont., there is a gambling house where the patronage of ladies is the special feature of the management, and where all kinds of women play the good old game of faro, perfectly at home and without fear of interruption. The entrance is from an alley near Broadway, and the house is luxuriously furnished. Carpets are laid on the floors, softened lights shine over the players, courteous attendants deal and shuffle the cards and pay bets or take winnings without the slightest suggestion of the incongruity of the situation.

Here many fashionably gowned women of Butte's elite come in parties or in pairs with escorts, to quietly venture silver or gold pieces coined from copper by their husbands, who busy themselves in Butte's continuous political war.

Women of the business world keep track of the game, and both dealer and player usually maintain a rigid silence. Money is passed out for chips with the simple word "five" or "ten," and conversation is economized to a minimum.

And there are schemes to inveigle the unsuspecting that only the initiated understand. Many women of the middle classes are among the most regular patrons of the place. A waiter girl was recently observed playing her week's wages with prenomenal luck. With $15 she had won $60, and had cashed in her chips with charming coolness, prepared to go home "winner." The dealer paid her without comment. He counted out the money—two twenty-dollar bills, one ten, one five, four dollars in silver, two half-dollars. She picked up the money, put the bills in her purse, and laid a half-dollar on the ace. It lost. She laid down a dollar. It won. Another few moments and she had lost the silver. Reluctantly she drew out a five-dollar note and began to play again. In a few deals she was playing heavily again. In half an hour she was broke. It was a simple trick which has won the bank many millions of dollars after the player cashed in—the manner of payment. One is reluctant to break a bill, but silver is convenient to lay down on a card, and most gamblers will do it. Before they know it they are again drawn into the game. They sometimes win, it is true, for the games are on the square; but one cannot win always, and the chance on a second round is in favor of the "tiger."

Of Thirty Years Ago

She's walking in her garden, with quiet step and slow—
Ann Smith, who lost her lover now thirty years ago.
Between the clean, white palings the village people view
Her moving 'midst the tulips all drowsy with the dew.
The breezes breathe of springtime, of springtime lilts the rill.
There's springtime in the robin's enraptured vesper trill;
There's springtime in the blossoms she brushes to and fro;
And in her heart the springtime of thirty years ago.

The lane is lying yonder wrapped deep in fragrant gloom,
By bursting hawthorn bordered and cherry trees in bloom.
The moths athwart it flutter on errant, ghostly wing,
Adown its dusky vista the crickets bravely sing.
The crescent moon is shedding a tender light above,
The air is soft and dreamy, and quivering with love.
The world is full of longing, of whispers vague and low,
As in that other springtime of thirty years ago.

'Twas just in such a springtime, 'twas just on such an eve
That there beneath the poplar he took his last, fond leave,
And blindly she turned downward, aware of only this:
Within her breast his promise, upon her lips his kiss.
Oh, April after April, invokes the twilight lane,
And April after April the garden wakes—in vain;
For never will their coverts another springtime know
Like that dear, sweet old springtime of thirty years ago.

Ann Smith is straight and slender; her brow is calm and fair;
Her voice is clear and patient, and smooth and thick her hair.
No flakes have touched her tresses, no frost her cheeks can dim.
To her 'tis always springtime, and she must wait for him.
And when the gloaming gathers around the garden gate,
And when each thrush and pigeon has sought his gentle mate,
The children of the village will lead you past, to show
The maid who lost her lover now thirty years ago.

We intended to give our readers a tabulated statement of the vote, but will give it next week. L. H. Reynolds polled 780 votes, A. G. Dake 165, S. J. Jennings 7 for probate judge. The other nominees are: For treasurer, J. Bice; tax collector, T. J. Hubbard; tax assessor, L. B. Pounds; circuit clerk, Sam W. Collins; coroner, Frank Massey; superintendent of education, J. W. Moore; commissioners, first district, W. H. Conway; second district, Alex Glasscock; third district, R. P. Kendrick; fourth district, Moses Robinson. The most of the defeated candidates are acting like gentlemen so far, and having submitted their case to the people they abide by the people's verdict. To many of them we say, "Better luck next time." Hurrah for the people. "Vox populi, vox Dei."

ABOUT REGISTERING.

Extracts from the general election law of Alabama:

Section 2. The following persons shall be disqualified both from registering and voting: All idiots and insane persons; those who were by reason of conviction of crime disqualified from voting at the time of the ratification of the constitution on November 28, 1901; those who have been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted of treason, murder, arson, embezzlement, malfeasance in office, larceny, receiving stolen property, obtaining money under false pretenses, perjury, subornation of perjury, robbery, assault with intent to rob, burglary, forgery, bribery, assault and battery on wife, bigamy, living in adultery, sodomy, incest, rape, miscegenation, crime against nature, or any crime punishable by imprisonment in penitentiary, or for any infamous crimes or crime involving moral turpitude; also, any person who has been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted as a vagrant or tramp, or of selling or offering to sell his vote or the vote of another, or of making or offering to make false returns in any election by the people or in any primary election to procure the nomination or election of any person to any office, or of suborning any witness or registrar to secure the registration of any person as an elector, provided that any person who is disqualified from voting by reason of conviction of any of the offenses mentioned in this section, except treason, whether the conviction was had in a state or federal court, has been pardoned, may be restored to his citizenship with right to vote by the governor, approved by the board of pardons and specially expressed in the pardon.

Sec. 7 1-2. The following persons and no others, who, if their place of residence shall remain unchanged, will have, at the date of the next general election, the qualifications as to residence prescribed by section 1 of this act, shall be qualified to register as electors, provided they shall not be disqualified under section 2 of this act:

1st. Those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who are physically unable to work; and those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who have worked or been regularly engaged in some lawful employment, business or occupation, trade or calling for the greater part of the twelve months next preceding the time they offer to register, and those who are unable to read and write, if such inability is due solely to physical disability; or,

2d. The owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of forty acres of land situate in this state, upon which they reside; or the owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of any woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of real estate situate in this state, assessed for taxation at the value of three hundred dollars or more or the owner in good faith, in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith, in her own right, of personal property in this state assessed for taxation for three hundred dollars or more; provided, that the taxes due upon such real or personal property for the year next preceding the year in which he offers to register shall have been paid, unless the assessment shall have been legally contested and is undetermined.

Sec. 15. Any elector who registered prior to January 1, 1903, who has changed the county of his residence shall be registered on application on production of his certificate, unless he has since become disqualified.

Sec. 16. When the certificate of any elector who was duly registered has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, on application stating that the certificate has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, and verified by affidavit, and it appears of record that such applicant has been registered, the judge of probate of the county of registration or the secretary of state shall issue to the applicant a certificate that he was duly registered as an elector. Such certificate shall be issued free of charge to the elector. The secretary of state shall at the expense of the state furnish the judge of probate blank certificates for use as provided in this section.

The certificate of the registrars or the judge of probate or of the secretary of state shall be sufficient to establish the fact of such registration.

Be sure and register when the registrars are in your beat, as the only excuse for not doing so is by reason of sickness of yourself or in your family, or by absence from the county. Everybody can register this summer who will be qualified by residence or age by the 8th day of November. Poll tax paying has nothing to do with registration; you can register now and pay your poll tax afterwards, but you can not vote unless you are both registered and have paid your poll tax (if any is due). The period of residence necessary to register is two years in the state, one year in the county, and three months in the beat. If you have moved from one beat to another in the county less than three months before election day, you can vote in your old beat, so you don't lose your vote by changing beats. Any one who desires to register on property qualification should take with him his last assessment sheet and tax collector's receipt to show to the registrars as proof that you are possessed of such property, and pay taxes on it. You can register under ANY of the following heads:

1. If you own 40 acres or more land in this state, and reside upon it.

2. If your wife owns 40 acres or more land in this state, upon which you reside.

3. If you own real estate in this state that is assessed for taxation at $300 or more.

4. If your wife owns real estate in this state assessed for taxation at $300 or more.

5. If you own personal property in this state assessed for taxation for $300 or more.

6. If your wife owns personal property in this state assessed for taxation for $300 or more.

7. If you can read and write any section of the constitution of the United States.

Don't give up your life certificate that you got in 1902; you only have to show it to the registrars in case you have moved to this county from some other county.

THE UNION will furnish any one information on any special points that they may be in doubt upon, and stands ready to help any one to get all the rights he is entitled to under the laws of Alabama. If you think you are entitled to register and the registrars should refuse you, take a couple of good men with you so you can have witnesses as to such refusal and the reasons given by the registrars, and thereby be enabled to take your case up to higher authority. tf

Selfishness the Peril of Our Modern Life

A Warning Against Loss of Faith and Enthusiasm

By President A. T. Hadley, of Yale.

THE battle lines of the nineteenth century have engaged in conquests of peace as well as of war. The boasts of the men of scientific and industrial progress are no less loud than those of the Captains and Kings. In our assemblies and our marts no less than in our armies and our navies the tumult and shouting tend to crowd out the remembrance of things that are more fundamental and more essential.

If wealth and dominion are made a primary object, and are trusted as a source of National strength instead of its consequence or evidence, there is a false reliance. And it is an unfortunate fact that very few nations have achieved wealth or dominion without suffering loss of faith and enthusiasm and remaining with the empty husk of greatness at the very moment when they deemed themselves most powerful. For along with the acquisition of power there is apt to come a relaxing of discipline. Along with the attainment of the means of industrial ease there comes a philosophy of life which makes industrial ease the goal and end of human effort.

In almost every age of scientific progress and material prosperity the dogmas by which discipline was supported are undermined and the old rule of the law mitigated by the progress of scientific criticism; until the people, having lost certain outworks of an ancient faith which were deemed essential abandons the whole ground on which that faith rested, takes up a new philosophy of life which seems stronger than the old merely because its weak points have not been so fully examined, and ere the change is fuller realized finds its real power destroyed and its glory a thing of the past.

Our chief danger comes from trusting to the work of reason in a place where we are imperfectly prepared for its operation. Most of us are constituted and trained that the relaxation of discipline will not leave us at the mercy of blind passion, but it may leave us at the mercy of an almost equally blind spirit of selfish calculation.

The whole course of events in the nineteenth century has been such as to lay men open to this temptation. The attempt to make human selfishness a fundamental standard of right conduct is as disastrous as the attempt to make our unchecked animal instincts the standards of right conduct. Almost every evil—political, social, or commercial—which constitutes a serious menace to the permanent prosperity of our country can be traced directly to our national acceptance of selfishness as a basis of morality.

IN MEMORIAM

Of Brother C. G. Carwile.

Brethren: We have one member less than at our last communication in September, 1903. Brother C. G. Carwile died at his home in Autauga county, Ala. He was born in May, 1835, and was in his sixty-eighth year. He had been with our lodge ever since he was made a Mason in 1860 and was one of the oldest members we had at the time of his death. Brother Carwile joined the M. E. church in 1891. He lived a long and useful life, and it is with keen regret that we have to sever our earthly association with him. We mourn with the family of our deceased brother, and while we fully realize the loss of a member of the lodge at this place, we trust that one more is added to that lodge higher up, where parting will be no more. Respectfully submitted,

J. W. DENNIS,
J. M. CURLEE,
S. B. POWELL.

THE CHURCH OF GOD.

The saints will begin a series of meetings July 31st, 1904, at Bethany, three miles south of Thorsby, five miles north of Clanton and two miles west of Lomax, to continue as long as God leads. Brother Otto Bolds, of West Liberty, Ohio, is expected to conduct the meeting. All the services will be free to all God's people to do their duty as God leads them in testifying, praying, preaching or any other duties. Everybody is cordially invited to attend, especially the ministers. In some localities you've heard of holiness and the saints, and you've heard a lot which is not true, as the Lord's way has many bitter enemies today, the same as in days of yore, and they'll say most anything to kill the influence of the gospel. Come with our ears and hearts open to receive the gospel of Christ. It'll pay you to make a sacrifice to attend these meetings. You will hear nothing but the pure, unadulterated word of God, with no man's opinion mixed with it. All of you bring your Bibles and investigate this matter well. Don't stay off and talk about the saints until you hear for yourself. No public collections or begging money. Your souls are the most important part. Yours in love for the truth.

Lomax, Ala.

THE WINNER TO THE WORLD

You may laugh at my plans, you may say
I'm a fool to expect to succeed;
You may try to heap things in my way,
You may answer me "No" when I plead;
You may plot to destroy me and meet
My every advance with a frown,
You may spread out your snares for my feet,
But you can't keep me down!

You may question my right to aspire,
You may rail at my wish to mount high;
You may hold back the aid I require,
My worth you may grimly deny;
You may try to entice me away
From the path that leads up to renown,
You may scourge me and scoff and betray,
But you can't keep me down!

You may bring all your cunning to bear,
For the purpose of breaking my will;
You may load me with fetters to wear,
You may rail at my strength and my skill;
You may rob me of love and of trust,
You may call me knave, coward or clown,
You may press my face into the dust,
But you can't keep me down!

—S. E. Kiser.

VAN VIVIER'S "SCOOP"

BY DOROTHY DIX

Copyright, 1901, by Daily Story Publishing Company.

Existence, as Philip Van Vivier planned it, was to be a very pleasant affair. He had youth and health, and wealth, and he pictured the future a gay kaleidoscopic minglings of golf, and polo ponies, and grand opera, and little suppers after the play, and London seasons and Parisian boulevards, and it really seemed to him—when he stopped to moralize—that this was a pretty good old world after all, and that given these things and a good digestion a man might be happy if he tried.

Then, too, to crown it all there was Madge. Madge, tall and slight, and svelt, with the tawny gold in her hair, and the eyes that changed with every changing thought—that were as blue as summer skies when she smiled, and grew black as midnight when she thrilled to any deep emotion. Philip could hardly remember a time when he had not loved her. They had grown up, boy and girl, together, with something singularly similar in their fate. Both were orphaned children, left to the untender care of unwilling relatives, and Philip never forgot the moment of their meeting. His uncle's place adjoined that of Madge's guardian, and he had been wandering about the grounds, a forlorn and lonely childish figure, when he first came upon the little maid. She gave one long look at his somber face and mourning clothes, and then, with that swift and intuitive sympathy that God gives to even the youngest child, she went up to him.

"Little boy," she lisped, for she was scarcely more than a baby, "little boy, is 'oo lonesome, and doesn't nobody love 'oo?"

"No," he had answered with a sob from the depths of his hungry little heart.

"Don't c'y, little boy," she comforted, slipping her hand in his, "I 'ill love 'oo, and 'oo won't never be lonesome any more," and, indeed, it seemed to Philip he had never been lonesome again. There was always Madge.

But who may count securely on the future? Move the kaleidoscope ever so gently and its figures change. There came a day when Philip had to do, not with visions of a golden future, but with a hard and merciless present. Suddenly, as an unexpected thunderbolt came the failure of the trust company in which his fortune was invested, and he awoke one morning to find himself that most pitiable of all creatures on earth—the man who needs money, and knows no way of earning it. He had taken the blow standing, with a smile on his lips, like the thoroughbred he was, and just how deep the hurt went none knew.

"Oh, Philip, Philip!"

"Pleasant prospect," was his sole comment with a shrug of his shoulders to those who would have condoled with him on his loss, "a beer income, with a champagne taste. Do you happen to know the best way of adjusting them?"

He might meet the situation with laughter and scoffing so far as others were concerned, but when it came to Madge it was another thing. "I can't ask her to marry a beggar," he said to himself, setting his teeth, and with a face as white as death, "and I'm not poltroon enough to settle down and live on her money," and there had ben a terrible scene.

"Oh, Philip, Philip," she had cried, clinging to him, "what good is all my money to me if I can't make things easy for you? Surely there is more than enough for us both."

Then he had tried to explain to her, blunderingly, and haltingly, that something that is dearer to man than even the love of woman—that something which he must have, or die of self-loathing—his own self-respect.

And in the end Madge "saw." The sympathy that always understood others was part of her charm, and Philip went away to face that unknown world of work that is so hard, and gives such scant rewards to the untried laborer.

At college he had rather distinguished himself by some clever skits in the college journal, and so it seemed natural to him to turn to journalism as the most available way of settling the bread and butter problem. A friend obtained a place for him on the staff of the morning Asterisk, where he began as the bottom of the reportorial ladder.

Philip kept doggedly on. He acquired a reputation for being faithful and accurate. He was a gourmand for work, and the city editor began to speak hopefully of him, but advancement comes slowly in a newspaper office, and to Philip, Madge seemed an immeasurable distance off, when suddenly he made his great scoop. It was the merest accident—successes mostly are—if we knew the truth of them. One evening he was walking along one of the fashionable residence streets, when suddenly he was startled by a scream, and looking up he saw a woman with the wild eyes and cunning of a maniac sitting on the very outer coping of the walls of a tall house, where she waved her arms gleefully, and leaned dizzily forward to peer into the street below. In an instant all the mystery of the drawn blinds and jealously guarded doors of the mansion, at which many had marveled, was revealed. Here was one of those family tragedies, at which the world guesses—some poor crazed creature, living out her life within padded walls, and who had escaped from her keepers, and with that instinct of flight from a prison that survives all reason, was preparing to take a fatal leap into the street below.

It had taken Philip but an instant to realize the scene, and with a sudden inspiration he dashed past the servant in the doorway, and up the three long flights of steps, and through the open door in the roof, through which she had evidently climbed. The woman looked up at the sound of an approaching step. She saw a handsome young man coming toward her. When he reached her he made a courtly bow and offered her his arm, and without one protest, mechanically, naturally, as if they had been on the ballroom floor, she arose and put her hand within it, and together they started towards the house, treading the narrow ledge, whose outer edge was death. A single push of the crazed woman's feeble hand and mutilation waited for them below, but there was not a tremble in the man's voice as he asked:

"And what do you think of the new tenor this winter at the opera?"

In the street below the crowd stood silent, tense with excitement, until they saw Philip hand the woman, still with courtly grace, through the door in the roof, and then it broke into tumultuous cheering.

As for Philip, his one thought was to get to the office. He realized the value of the story. The secret of the darkened mansion. The closed blinds. The beautiful woman, with her wild, mad eyes—it was full of color, it was picturesque. Besides it was a scoop.

There is, perhaps, no other joy in life equal to that which the young writer reads his own productions in type, and Philip's first conscious act the next morning was to reach for the paper. He had expected his story to be given some prominent place; perhaps to be featured. To his dismay it was not even printed. How long he might have stared at the paper in bewilderment he never knew, but that two letters caught his eyes, as they lay upon his table. One was from the city editor of the Asterisk, and he pounced upon it for an explanation.

"Dear Van Vivier," he read, "sorry, but your scoop was scooped. The distressed damsel you rescued is old La Roux's daughter, and La Roux, as you appear not to know, is the heaviest stockholder in the Asterisk. Naturally he wanted your story killed. Virtue is rewarded, however. He suggests you for night editor in place of Carson, who has resigned. Report for duty to-night."

The other letter was from Madge. It said:

"Dear Philip—I have heard of your rescue of poor Fannie La Roux. How could you be such a hero, and such a goose as to take such a risk. You need a guardian, sir, and I am going to marry you to take care of you, on this day one month. You can't refuse a lady, you know. Yours, Madge."

Philip read the letter twice, and then he bowed his head on the table, and when he raised it his eyes were dim and tender.

SHOULD BE CLEAN-SHAVEN.

Writer Says Ideal Man Wears No Hair on His Face.

A recent writer says: "The ideal man is clean-shaven. Confidently he exposes to the world his features undisguised by hirsute appendages. Can we conceive the Apollo Belvedere with even a mustache? I doubt it. A merely honest man also, one would think, should wear no hair upon his face. And for these reasons: Each of us in great measure, partly from exaggerated ideas of his own perspicacity, partly from the stress of life, judges his neighbor from his face. His clothes are but a doubtful index of his character. But his features are, we firmly believe, indicative of his nature and his mode of life.

"There may be villany written large on his upper lip. A certain mold of chin betrays its owner as a man of considerable homicide tendencies. Cover the lips with a waterfall mustache, drape the chin with an Assyrian beard, and it may well be that murderous monster is a pleasing enough fellow to view. Such an one does not venture to pass clean-shaven through the streets. Let each one of us present in all candor such features as are his.

"To possess a receding chin is no crime. It is merely a sign of weakness. But to conceal it with a huge and bushy beard and thereby to present the appearance of a man endowed with great strength of will is surely a false pretense. I do not maintain that all beared men are rogues and murderers. But I reserve my judgment and suspect them of roguery and homicide."

The Life of the Cell.

It is no extravagance and no mere figure of speech to say that cells move about with apparent purpose, that they feel, that they suffer and enjoy, that they absorb and assimilate food, that they live, love, marry, propagate, and die. And we can say with as much truth that they think. But of this last mentioned function it will be well to defer discussion until a subsequent time.

The cell, therefore, does all that the man does, has all that the man has, and possesses, within its tiny compass, heart, vein, muscle, nerve, artery, skin, bone, cartilage and what not of the future organism of the composition of which it forms one of the ultimate constituent parts.—Michael A. Lane, in National Magazine.

Wanted—A Pin.

It was Mabel's first appearance at church and she was rather fidgety. First she wanted one thing, then another. Finally she decided that she must have a pin, so she asked for one from her father. He had none. Then she tried her mother; but her mother, too, had none. Mabel's longing had been increased with her ill success, so she climbed upon the pew and shouted at the top of her small voice:

"Has anyone in dis trowd dot a pin?"—Lippincott's.

Recipe for Longevity.

Rev. Dr. Robert Collyer, the famous New York divine, celebrated his eightieth birthday quite recently. "I have never been sick a day in my life," says Dr. Collyer, "and I have never eaten my breakfast in bed. What is my recipe for longevity? Live a natural life, eat what you want and walk on the sunny side of the street."

REVIVAL OF THE INN.

Public Houses are Changed to Suit the Needs of the Day.

While some reformers are bent on ending the public house, others are busy at mending it. We need not decide for both; in many places there are too many public houses, and of those that would in any case remain, many might well be bettered. The annual report of the public house trust shows that substantial progress is being made in this direction. The principal aim of the trust is the revival of the inn as a place of all-round refreshment and its extinction as a mere drinking bar. "The man who asks for bovril gets the same smile as the man who asks for beer;" that is the advertisement and the motto. Lord Grey's movement is a most hopeful one; it takes for granted that men will not be deprived of their beer; but it offers every inducement to the consumption of other cups than those which inebriate, and of eatables as well as drinkables, and it provides decent, wholesome, cheerful surroundings. The movement is peculiarly opportune in rural districts. It comes at a time when there is a considerable revival in the wayside inn as a place of necessary refreshment. Hostelries which seemed to have been killed by the railway are coming to life, thanks to the bicycle and the motor. At a time when so many people are thus taking to the road again, it is very appropriate that an effort should be made to improve the roadside inn.—London Chronicle.

ERRORS OF THE TYPES.

A Few of the Misprints That Shorten Editors' Lives.

At a literary dinner in New York C. D. Gibson, the illustrator, quoted a number of amusing misprints for several years, and already had in his collection 200 good specimens.

He first quoted a misprint about a bishop who was confined to the house with a violent cold. The newspaper that mentioned the prelate's illness said he was "confined to the house with a violent scold."

Another quotation concerned a British nobleman who had joined a party of friends in Hampshire for the purpose of shooting pheasants. This the compositor had made to read: "He has joined a party of friends in Hampshire for the purpose of shooting peasants."

"That, though," said Mr. Gibson, "is an old and famous misprint, and you may have heard of it before. You may, too, have heard of the one about a 'surgeon taken alive in the river that sold for six cents a pound.' But I doubt if any of you have ever heard of the misprint that appeared last February in a Vermont newspaper. This paper wished to say, in praise of a very aged and distinguished citizen:

"'John Green is a noble old burgher, proudly loving his native state.'

"But the types made this sentence run:

"John Green is a nobby old burglar, prowling around in a naked state.'"

Stuff Heroes are Made Of.

Five millions for heroes—come, bring on the stuff!
Disburse it at once, we have heroes enough.
There's the hero who rescues the drowning from death,
The hero who braves the red flames' tongue and breath,
There are heroes on land, there are heroes on sea,
There are heroes of varying style and degree,
But the man who slams out a homer when there are two or three men on bases and brings in the runs that win the game for the home team in the last half of the ninth inning—
He is the kind of a hero for me!

The women, God bless them, come in for a share
Of the heroine fund—there are heroes to spare
In the ranks of the sex; there's the one who can bake
The pies, rich and juicy, like mother would make,
There's the heroic woman, a marvel, I ween,
Who raises six children and keeps them all clean,
But the woman who never trumps her partner's ace, never leads from a short suit, and not once during the evening asks what is trumps and whose ace is that—
She is the kind of a hero I mean.

Had His Revenge.

The few persons on the uptown elevated station at Chambers street early Friday morning were startled a bit to see a thick-set chap climb over the railing just north of the men's waiting room. He looked down toward the street and rubbed his nose. In a moment or so another fellow was seen at the top of the stairway. In two shakes of a lamb's tail, he, too, was over the railing. Both of them looked across at the other station, but it was deserted. There is a turnstile there instead of a ticket chopper.

"We ought to tell the man," said a woman to her escort.

"Nix," was the reply. "The company stuck me on a plugged dime the other day. Now we're square."—New York Sun.

What He Needed.

Admiral Walker, since becoming one of the Panama Canal Commissioners, has had his patience somewhat tried by persons who have been to the isthmus giving him gratuitous information concerning the climate there.

One man informed him that after returning from a journey to the place he went to his physician to learn if he had malaria in his system. The doctor showed him a drop of his blood under the microscope, "and," said the narrator, "it was full of the microbes of malaria. They looked like a lot of lively potato bugs."

"Then what you need, I should think," said the admiral dryly, "would be a dose of insect powder."

Echo of Great War

In Alameda, California, a suburb of San Francisco, there are many vegetable gardens, some kept by Italians, some by Greeks, but most of them by Chinamen.

Ten years ago these gardeners were almost all Chinamen, and they acquired the belief that a monopoly of the business was their right. About seventy of them had formed a colony just outside Alameda, and laid out a garden of about twenty acres.

One day some Japanese showed up and leased an adjoining strip of land. They put up some shacks, and then, to the great indignation of the Chinamen, they began plowing up their land for garden truck.

Of course, there could be no friendly relations between them, but for a year their enmity found expression in nothing worse than scowls and occasional boundary disputes.

Then came the Chino-Japanese war. Feeling ran high among the San Francisco Chinamen because their local papers printed some fiery editorials against the Japs. This spirit of jingoism was communicated to the Alameda Chinamen, and the relations between them and their Japanese neighbors became intensely strained.

The Japs placed outposts along the boundary fences, fearing that the Chinese would raid their truck patches and trample all over [illegible]. The Chinamen took similar precautions.

This was the situation for [illegible] until at last the news came of the glorious Chinese defeat.

The Chinamen were deeply [illegible] and one morning they lined up along the fence, seventy strong, and [illegible] Japanese, in a mixture of Chinese and English profanity, just how infinitesimal they considered them.

The Japs sounded a call to arms, told the Chinamen that they were unclean monkeys, and that they didn't keep to leeward of them, would give them an illustration of how Wei-hai-wei had been captured.

A Chinaman picked up a [illegible] which presently landed on a Jap's head.

Two hours later the chief of Alameda county was called [illegible] peace. Both the Japanese and Chinese settlements had been [illegible] ed, the gardens torn up and [illegible] Jap and Chinaman bore physical evidence of the fierceness of the fight.

Next day the head man of the Chinese colony paid a fine, the Japs returned to their ranches [illegible] huts, and ever after lived on terms of terms with each other. They let off the surplus steam of their patriotism.

He Was the Promoter

How Seth Bullock, superintendent of the Black Hills forest reserve, personal friend of the President and not infrequently a guest at the White House, and a noted western character, managed to secure a fancy drink in the early days of Helena, is told by a former resident of that city, now of this. It serves to show that the age of "promotion" is not as young as is pictured by later date savants.

It was in the early '70's, when Helena was one of the banner placer mining camps of the west and gold was being washed by hundreds of men from the sands of Last Chance gulch (now Main street). Bullock wanted a fancy drink and did not care to remunerate the bartender with a fancy price in lieu, so he evolved a plan which worked to perfection.

Entering the saloon, Bullock said: "G——, I'll tell you what let's do. If you will furnish the sherry, I'll furnish the fresh eggs, and we will mix up a drink that is out of sight."

As eggs were worth $2 a dozen [illegible] liquor man decided that it was a bargain, although wine was [illegible] at a stiff figure in those days. Bullock went into a grocery [illegible] and said to the proprietor:

"W——, if you will furnish the [illegible] I'll furnish the sherry and we will have something worth while in the line of fancy drinks."

The grocer agreed to furnish the eggs, and a few minutes later [illegible] entered the liquor house. The concoction was duly prepared and the three began to absorb it.

As Seth swallowed his share the idea struck the bartender.

"Say," demanded he, turning to Seth, "where do you come in on this game, anyway? W—— has furnished the eggs and I have supplied the liquor. How do you get in?"

"Oh, I'm the promoter," replied Bullock with a smile.

There was nothing left to say.—Washington Post.

Have to Eat Arsenic

Eating of arsenic is common in Styria. The Styrians say that arsenic makes one plump and comely and gives one strength for great exertions, such as running or mountain climbing.

Styria, in Austria, gives the world vast quantities of arsenic; the manufacture of this drug is indeed the main Styrian industry. They who make arsenic eat it, as a rule, for they say that only the arsenic eater can withstand the arsenic fumes.

These makers and eaters of the drug are comely. They have a blooming and clear color. They look much younger than they are.

"The foreman in a certain arsenic factory told me that in his boyhood, when he first came to that plant, he was advised to begin to eat arsenic lest his health suffer from the fumes," says a toxicologist. "He did begin, and his first two or three small doses gave him a sharp pain, like a [illegible] the stomach, and this pain was followed by tremendous hunger [illegible] violent, disagreeable excitement as his doses increased in [illegible] and size their effect became [illegible] There was no longer pain after [illegible] ment; on the contrary, there [illegible] ravenous appetite and a most [illegible] ous activity wherein the user [illegible] do three men's work.

He looked at 30, with [illegible] pink and white color, no more [illegible] He was as robust as a blacksmith [illegible] he said he would die at 45 or [illegible] being the age at which all the [illegible] arsenic eaters die."

Cost of Good Roads

The cost of road building varies in the different places according to the topography of the country and the proximity of the stone used, says Franklin Matthews, in June Outing. A satisfactory highway can be built eighteen feet wide, exclusively of stone, usually for $3,000 to $3,500 a mile. These are known as macadam roads. A more costly stone road running from $4,000 to $6,000 a mile is the Telford road. Both are named after Scotchmen, who first devised the systems. The macadam road consists of a deep foundation of large stones, laid as smoothly together as possible, the foundation stones being of a nearly uniform size. A layer of small stones is placed over the foundation and rolled down, binding the two together. Then layers of crushed [illegible] each layer being of a finer [illegible] than its predecessor, are rolled [illegible] and over the foundations. The [illegible] layer is of very fine crushed [illegible] The whole settles itself into a [illegible] pact mass, almost as smooth as [illegible] stone, from which water runs off [illegible] soon as it falls. The Telford [illegible] more expensive because the [illegible] tion is laid with more care. The [illegible] dation stones are of a uniform [illegible] and are laid with the ends [illegible] like so many bricks set [illegible] These are bound together by [illegible] sizes of stone, the various layers [illegible] of finer stone being laid [illegible] in the same way as for the [illegible] roads. The durability of such a [illegible] way is unquestionably longer [illegible] other kind of a road known.

In the Twilight Hour

In dreams I hear the bleating
Of the sheep, just over there,
Or the lowing of the cattle
On the quiet evening air
As homeward from the grazing
They slowly wend their way,
When twilight shadows lengthen
And softly fades the day.

In dreams I see the forest
When spring its youth renews,
Or autumn turns its verdure
To gold and crimson hues;
In dreams I see its beauty
All mantled o'er with snow,
Or tread again its pathways—
Pathways of long ago.

In dreams I hear the music
Of the gently-flowing stream,
As its waters thread the shadow
Or in the sunlight gleam;
In dreams I skim its surface
Joyous and sorrow-free,
When biting cold has locked it
With winter's icy key.

In dreams I see the homestead
Fast failing to decay,
The vines that clambered o'er it
Gone, gone this many a day;
I see the forms and faces
That greeted me at dawn,
But I listen for a footfall
And a voice forever gone.

In dreams I see my mother—
The boy's best friend, and [illegible]
Ere time had dimmed the lustre
Of the sweet soul shining [illegible]
I live again the springtime
With shadows over-cast,
And hear a farewell wafted
From out the voiceless past.

Miss Alice M. Smith, of Minneapolis, Minn., tells how [illegible]'s monthly suffering [illegible] permanently relieved by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I have [illegible] before given my endorsement to my medicine, but Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has added so much to my life and happiness that I feel like making an exception in this case. For two years every month I would have two days of pain, and could find no relief. But one day when visiting a friend I read about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound,—she had used it with the best results and advised me to try it. I found that it worked wonders with me; I now experience no pain, and only had to use a few bottles to bring about this wonderful change. I use it occasionally now when I am exceptionally tired or worn out.—MISS ALICE M. SMITH, 804 Third Ave. South Minneapolis, Minn., Chairman Executive Committee, Minneapolis Civic Club.—$5000 forfeit if original of above [illegible] genuineness cannot be produced.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound carries women safely through the various natural crises and is the safe-guard of woman's health.

The truth about this great medicine is told in the letters from women being published in this paper constantly.

A BUDGET OF HUMOR

A POOR EXCUSE.

There was a young man at Fort Blainey,
Who proposed to a typist named Janey;
When his friend cried, "Oh, dear!
She's so old and so queer!"
He replied, "But the day was so rainy."—Chicago Journal.

PERHAPS.

Mrs. Highmore (with cold dignity)—"To what am I indebted for the honor of this visit?"

Unexpected Caller—"To your careless servant. I dare say she forgot that you were not at home."—Chicago Tribune.

WHY HE LIKED IT.

"You friend looked at the lines in my palm the other evening," said Miss Elderly, "and he said it was a great pleasure to read such a hand as mine."

"Yes," assented Miss Paraffine, "George is a great hand to read ancient history."—Indianapolis Sun.

GREAT ADVANTAGE.

Silas—My son Hiram writes from college that he is learning French.

Cyrus—By beck, a college education is some use, after all. If he ever gets a job as waiter he can write the menu cards.—Chicago News.

"Me object to my mother-in-law! I should say not!"

"You bet we do. And you ought to see her boss my wife around.—Baltimore World.

ANNOYED.

"I am strongly inclined to think that your husband has appendicitus," said the physician.

"That's just like him," answered Mrs. Cumrox. "He always waits till everything has pretty near gone out of style before he decides to get it."—Washington Star.

A PROPER TITLE.

"Yes," remarked the demoralizer, "and the majority of men seem to be shy of associating with strangers."—Chicago News.

"That's what I've always understood."

"Well, he isn't. I've seen him eat. He has the stomach of an ostrich, and he gives dollar tips." —Chicago Tribune.

Bessie—There goes that Mr. Primple. How I do hate the man!

Bessie—But you should have seen the way that he and Bertha Twittle went on at the reception last night. I never did like Bertha.—Boston Transcript.

TOLD AT LAST.

"A woman can't keep a secret," declares the mere man.

"Oh, I don't know," retorts the fluttery lady. "I've kept my age a secret since I was twenty-four."

"Yes, but one of these days you will give it away. In time you will simply have to tell it."

"Well, I think that when a woman has kept a secret for twenty years she comes pretty near knowing how to keep it."—Judge.

TACT.

SCIENCE SAVES OYSTERS.

Impoverished Beds Greatly Improved by Artificial Means.

It has been observed that oysters grow much slower on some beds than on others; that in certain places they fail to fatten, writes Barton W. Everman in The National Geographical Magazine. These places were usually on overcrowded beds, and sometimes good results could be secured by transplanting or thinning out. Qualitative and quantitative study of the diatoms (which constitute the food of oysters) on beds where the oysters fatten well, and on other beds where they fatten poorly, showed that the number of diatoms per liter of water was very much greater in the former than in the latter.

It was, therefore, believed that if the supply of diatoms could be increased on the unproductive beds the oysters on them would grow and fatten. Experiments along these lines were recently inaugurated at Lynnhaven, Va., under the immediate direction of Dr. H. F. Moore of the bureau of fisheries. A small cove was selected where the bottom and the salinity of the water were favorable, but where diatoms were scarce. Commercial fertilizers of certain kinds were used to furnish food for the diatoms, and it was very soon found that the latter greatly increased in abundance, and lean oysters transferred to this cove fattened rapidly. Details of the process need not be given here, but it is believed that the experiments will demonstrate the entire practibility of the artificial feeding and fattening of oysters on a commercial basis.

Only one veteran of the Mexican and Spanish wars has thus far applied for a pension from the government. The one applicant is C. B. Hunt, who was once a resident of Massachusetts. Any veteran of the Mexican war who survived to fight against Spain must have been nearly three score and ten years old, the allotted span of life, and the man who enlists at the age of 70 must needs be patriotic and well fortified with a strong constitution in order to undertake the fatigues of a second campaign.—Boston Advertiser.

The life of an express locomotive in England is estimated at twenty-five years; that of a freight locomotive at twenty-six years, that of an ordinary passenger engine at twenty-five and that of a switch engine at twenty-seven. In the United States the life of an express locomotive is eighteen years, of a freight engine sixteen years, of a passenger engine nineteen years and of a switch engine twenty-two years. In eighteen years, however, the American machine has run 2,000,000 miles—double the average travel of an English locomotive.

The Western Society of Engineehs, at Chicago, Ill., recently heard a paper read by John M. Sweeney, on pulverized coal for combustion under steam boilers. Results of comparitive trials showed that 9.4 pounds of water, equivalent evaporation from and at 212 degrees Fahr., were realized per pound of fuel with the pulverized coal, and 7.5 pounds per pound of fuel with hand firing. On the basis of combustible the equivalent evaporation in the two cases was 10.47 and 8.4 pounds, respectively.

Pearls Found in Wisconsin Rivers.

J. A. To some friends at the hotel, Mr. Young exhibited some of his rare specimens, among which was one for which he said he would not take $10,000. "I believe it is the most perfect pearl in the country today," said Mr. Young. "I have been told this by experts and I have seen none better. I have been engaged in the buying and selling of pearls for 17 years, ever since pearls were first found in Wisconsin rivers. The first pearls were found at that time by a Norwegian, who was fishing on the Sugar river. He realized that they were valuable and kept at the business for two years before people realized what he was about. Then he sent the pearls to New York and received a check for about $600. After that he began to spend his money and took in two Yankees as partners. That ended it for him."—Milwaukee Sentinel.

An excellent illustration of how electricity is superseding steam in many quarters is found in a contract recently awarded by a shipbuilding company of Buffalo. The company has decided to install electric power to pump out its floating dry docks in the Erie basin. The motors to be constructed will work the pumps much faster than the steam engines formerly in use, it being estimated that the docks can be cleared in two and one-half hours less time. To accomplish this a 35-horsepower motor will be located on each side of the two docks, and the electricity will be supplied by a cable laid along the bottom of the basin.

"I took Peruna last summer when I was all run down, and had a headache and backache, and no ambition for anything. I now feel as well as I ever did in all my life, and all thanks is due to your excellent Peruna."—Bess F. Healy.

The symptoms of summer catarrh are quite unlike in different cases, but the most common ones are general lassitude, played-out, tired-out, used-up, run-down feelings, combined with more or less heavy, stupid, listless, mental condition. Relish for food and the ability to digest food seems to be lost.

Skin eruptions, sallow complexion, biliousness, coated tongue, fitful, irregular sleep, help to complete the picture which is so common at this season.

Peruna so exactly meets all these conditions that the demand is so great for this remedy at this season of the year that it is nearly impossible to supply it.

Pe-ru-na Contains No Narcotics.

One reason why Peruna has found permanent use in so many homes is that it contains no narcotics of any kind. Peruna is perfectly harmless. It can be used any length of time without acquiring the drug habit.

Thousands of women suffer from pelvic catarrh and catarrhal nervousness and don't know it. If you feel fagged out, begin at once taking Dr. Hartman's Peruna. It will relieve your catarrhal affliction and all your organs will be restored to health. By a bottle to-day, as it will immediately alleviate your case.

ROOSEVELT NOTIFIED

Ceremony Occurred at Sagamore Hill Wednesday.

Cannon Spokesman.

THE NOMINATION ACCEPTED.

Synopsis of Both Addresses—Prominent Republicans of the Nation Attended the Ceremony.

President Roosevelt was notified formally Wednesday of his nomination for the presidency by the national republican convention. The ceremony took place at his country home at Sagamore Hill. In accordance with the wish of the president the ceremony was made as simple as possible.

The formal notification of the action of the convention was made in behalf of a committee representing every state and territory in the United States by Joseph G. Cannon, speaker of the house of representatives.

About 125 persons were present. A special train carried the members of the committee from Long Island City to Oyster Bay. The ceremony took place on the veranda and most of those in attendance gathered on the lawn.

When Speaker Cannon arose to deliver his speech of notification he was greeted with applause. A synopsis of his speech follows:

Mr. President: The people of the United States, by blood, heredity, education and practice, are a self-governing people. We have sometimes made mistakes, from a false sense of security or from a desire to change policies instead of letting well enough alone, merely to see what would happen, but we have always paid the penalty of unwise action at the ballot box and endured the suffering until, under the law, through the ballot box, we have returned to correct policies. Tested by experience no nation has so successfully solved all problems and chosen proper policies as our nation. Under the lead of the republican party for over forty years, the United States, from being a third-class power among the nations, has become in every respect first.

The people, under the lead of the republican party, wrote upon the statute books revenue laws, levying taxes upon the products of foreign countries seeking our markets which replenished our treasury, but were so adjusted as to encourage our people in developing, diversifying and maintaining our industries, at the same time protecting our citizens laboring in production against the competition of foreign labor. Under this policy, our manufactured product today is one-third of the product of the civilized world, and our people recieve almost double the pay for their labor that similar labor receives elsewhere in the world, thereby enabling us to bear the burden of citizenship.

Liberal compensation for labor makes liberal customers for our products. We have come to be the greatest exporting nation in the world. For the year ending the 30th of June, 1904, our exports to foreign countries were valued at $1,460,000,000, of which $450,000,000 were products of the factory. The world fell in our debt last year $470,000,000 an increase of $75,000,000 over the preceding year.

This policy of protection has always been opposed by the opponents of the republican party and is opposed by them today. In their last national platform, adopted at St. Louis, they denounce protection as robbery. Their platform is as silent as the grave touching the gold standard and our currency system. Their chosen leader, after his nomination, having been as silent as the sphynx to that time, sent his telegram, saying in substance that the gold standard is established and that he will govern himself accordingly if he should be elected.

I congratulate him. It is better to be right late than never. It is better to be right in one thing than wrong in all things. I wonder if it ever occurred to him that if his vote and support for his party's candidate in 1896 and 1900 had been decisive we would now have the silver standard. If, perchance, he should be elected by forcing together discordant elements, I submit that, with a democratic house of representatives or house and senate, there would be no harmonious action in legislation, or administration that would benefit the people, but that doubt and discontent would everywhere distress production and labor.

Since the republican party was restored to power, in 1897, under the lead of McKinley, our country has prospered in production and commerce as it has never prospered before. In wealth, we stand first among all the nations.

In the history of the republic, in time of peace, no executive has had greater questions to deal with than yourself, and none have brought greater courage, wisdom and patriotism to their solution. You have enforced the law against the mighty and the lowly without fear, favor or partiality. Under the constitution, you have recommended legislation to congress from time to time, as it was your duty to do, and when it was passed by congress, have approved it. You have, under the constitution, led in making a treaty which was ratified by the senate and is approved by the people, which not only assures, but, under the law and appropriations made by congress, proceeds with the construction of the Panama canal.

The office of president of the United States is the greatest on earth and many competent men in the republican party are ambitious to hold it, yet the republican convention met at Chicago June last and unanimously, with one accord, nominated you as the candidate of the party for president.

In pursuance of the usual custom, the convention appointed a committee of which it honored me with the chairmanship, to wait upon you and inform you of this action, which duty, speaking for the committee, I now cheerfully perform, with the hope and the confident expectation that a majority of the people of the republic will in November next approve the action of the convention by choosing electors who will assure your election to the presidency as your own successor.

At the close of Mr. Cannon's address the president advanced to the veranda railing, and standing under a great festoon of American flags delivered his address in response of the notification. As he faced the assemblage he was warmly applauded. The gist of Mr. Roosevelt's speech of acceptance follows:

Mr. Speaker and Gentlemen of the Notification Committee:

I am deeply sensible to the high honor conferred on me by the representatives of the republican party assembled in convention, and I accept the nomination for the presidency with solemn realization of the obligations I assume. I heartily approve the declaration of principles which the republican national convention has adopted, and at some future day I shall communicate to you, Mr. Chairman, more at length and in detail a formal written acceptance of the nomination.

Three years ago I became president because of the death of my lamented predecessor. I then stated that it was my purpose to carry out his principles and policies for the honor and the interest of the country. To the best of my ability I have kept the promise thus made. If next November my countrymen confirm at the polls the action of the convention you present I shall, under Providence, continue to work with an eye single to the welfare of all our people.

A party is of worth only in so far as it promotes the national interest, and every official, high or low, can serve his party best by rendering to the people the best service of which he is capable. We who have been entrusted with power as public servants during the past seven years of administration and legislation now come before the people content to be judged by our record of achievment

In all of this we are more fortunate than our opponents, who now appeal for confidence on the ground, which some express and some seek to have confidentially understood, that if triumphant they may be trusted to prove false to every principle which in the last eight years they have laid down as vital, and to leave undisturbed those very acts of the administration because of which they ask that the administration itself be driven from power. Seemingly their present attitude as to their past record is that some of them were mistaken and others insincere. We make our appeal in a wholly different spirit. We are not constrained to keep silent on any vital question; we are divided on no vital question; our policy is continuous, and is the same for all sections and localities. There is nothing experimental about the government we ask the people to continue in power, for our performance in the past, our proved governmental efficiency, is a guarantee as to our promise for the future.

In dealing with the great organizations known as trusts, we do not have to explain why the laws were not enforced, but to point out that they actually have been enforced and that legislation has been enacted to increase the effectiveness of their enforcement.

Assuredly it is unwise to change the policies which have worked so well and which are now working so well.

Prosperity has come at home. The national honor and interest have been upheld abroad. We have placed the finances of the nation upon a sound gold basis. We have done this with the aid of many who were formerly our opponents, but who would neither openly support nor silently acquiesce in the heresy of unsound finance; and we have done it against the convinced and violent opposition of the mass of our present opponents who still refuse to recant the unsound opinions which for the moment they think it expedient to assert. We know what we mean when we speak of an honest and stable currency. We mean the same thing from year to year.

Under the financial legislation which we have enacted there is now ample circulation for every business need; and every dollar of this circulation is worth a dollar in gold. We have reduced the interest-bearing debt and in still larger measure the interest on that debt. All of the war taxes imposed during the Spanish war have been removed with a view to relieve the people and to prevent the accumulation of an unnecessary surplus. In the fiscal year that has just closed the excess of income over the ordinary expenditures was nine millions of dollars. This does not take account of the fifty millions expended out of the accumulated surplus for the purchase of the Isthmian canal.

We were able to pay this fifty millions of dollars out of hand without causing the slightest disturbance to business conditions.

We have enacted a tariff law under which during the past few years the country has attained a height of material well-being never before reached. Wages are higher than ever before. That whenever the need arises there should be a readjustment of the tariff schedules is undoubted; but such changes can with safety be made only by those whose devotion to the principle of protective tariff is beyond question; for otherwise the changes would amount not to readjustment but to repeal.

We believe in reciprocity with foreign nations on the terms outlined in President McKinley's last speech, which urged the extension of our foreign markets by reciprocal agreements whenever they could be made without injury to American industry and labor.

We recognize the organization of capital and the organization of labor as natural outcomes of our industrial system. Each kind of organization is to be favored so long as it acts in a spirit of justice and of regard for the rights of others. Each is to be granted the full protection of the law, and each in turn is to be held to a strict obedience to the law; for no man is above it and no man below it.

Ever since the continent was discovered the need of an Isthmian canal to connect the Pacific and the Atlantic has been recognized; and ever since the birth of our nation such a canal has been planned. At last the dream has become a reality. The isthmian canal is now being built by the government of the United States.

In the Caribean sea we have made good our promise of independence to Cuba, and have proved our assertion that our mission in the island was one of justice and not of self-aggrandizement; and thereby no less than by our action in Venezuela and Panama we have shown that the Monroe doctrine is a living reality, designed for the hurt of no nation, but for the protection of civilization on the western continent, and for the peace of the world.

American interests in the Pacific have rapidly grown. American enterprise has laid a cable across this, the greatest of oceans.

Our foothold in the Philippines greatly strengthens our position in the competition for the trade of the east.; but we are governing the Philippines in the interest of the Philippine people themselves.

The principles which we uphold should appeal to all our countrymen, in all portions of our country. Above all they should give us strength with the men and women who are the spiritual heirs of thoes who upheld the hands of Abraham Lincoln; for we are striving to do our work in the spirit with which Lincoln approached his. During the seven years that have just passed there is no duy, domestic or foreign, which we have shirked; no necessary task which we have feared to undertake, or which we have not performed with reasonable efficiency. We have never pleaded impotence. We have never sought refuge in criticism and complaint instead of action. We face the future with our past and our present as guarantee of our promises; and we are content to stand or to fall by the record which we have made and are making.

At the conclusion of the address President Roosevelt held an informal reception and received the congratulations of the committeemen on his speech.

Among the invited guests were chairman George B. Cortelyou, Governor B. B. Odell, Senator T. C. Platt, Senator John Kean, of New Jersey, former Secretary Elihu Root, Cornelius N. Bliss and former Governor Frank S. Black.

Cut to 75 per cent.

At the meeting of the cotton mill men from North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia and Alabama, held at Charlotte, N. C. Tuesday, it was decided to curtail production to a basis of 75 per cent during the months of August and September because of the industrial condition of the market and the poor demand for finished goods. More than 2,000,000 spindles were represented at the meeting.

According to the official report of the postoffice department ninety-five rural letter carriers were appointed in Mississippi during the year just closed, making a total of 153 in the service. WASHINGTON'S ELM

Almost Two Hundred Years Old Has Been Cut Down.

Washington's Elm, a famous old tree which has stood at the corner of Elm and Morris streets, Morriston, N. J., for more than a century and three-quarters, has been cut down. Washington had his headquarters here during the winter of 1779-80. At that time there was talk of cutting down the tree, but on account of its beauty and great age, Washington prevailed upon the owner to leave it standing. Since then it has been famous as Washington's Elm, and has been protected in every possible way. When LaFayette came to Morristown in the early part of the nineteenth century he visited the historical tree and made a short address under its spreading branches.

FIRE IN STOCK YARDS.

Loss About $400,000. Accidental, Not Incendiary.

Fire broke out among the packing houses in the stock yards Wednesday in the lard refinery of Swift & Co., and soon gained such headway that every available fire engine in the stock yard district was called out.

Rumors of incendiarism were rife. Examination, however, apparently showed the cause of the blaze to have been an overheated dynamo.

Three hundred men presumably nonunionists were in the building, but all escaped. The fire caused a loss of less than $100,000.

The top story of the building was of wood construction, and burned like tinder. The contents of the building were said to be valued at $400,000.

He was general manager and treasurer of the Dallas Cotton Manufacturing company, operators of one of the largest mills in the south, and had financial interests in other enterprises. A son, Archie L. Risen, vice president of the Risen Banking company, survives him.

OVER NEW CHWANG

The Japanese Flag is Flying.

Kuropatkin May Withdraw as far as Mukden.

KUROPATKIN IS IN RETREAT

There Have Been Several Days' Fighting—Heavy Losses on Both Sides.

Lloyd's agent at New Chwang wires that fifty Japanese cavalrymen have entered New Chwang. The French flag is flying from all the Russian buildings. The town is quiet.

The port of New Chwang has been abandoned by the Russians. Russian authorities have no advices covering the details. The evacuation of New Chwang proper is expected to follow shortly.

The latest reports received here are to the effect that the Russians with about 100 guns in action in the Ta Tche Kiao engagement, inflicted serious losses on the Japanese and destroyed many of their munitions. The Japanese attack on the center of the position was repulsed, but the Russians were ordered to retire and occupy heights five miles north of Ta Tche Kiao. This movement was carried out in good order.

The empress' hospital train passed through Mukden bearing 314 men who were wounded in the fight at Ta Tche Kiao. The fight was mainly an artillery duel, according to the statements of the men on the train. It is understood the battle will be continued.

The Vladivostok squadron has been seen east of the island of Formosa (400 miles south of Shanghai, and about 1,350 miles southeast of Yokohama). It is understood that colliers are awaiting cruisers there. The further destination of the squadron is not known. The squadron held up many ships during its passage.

In European circles the capture of New Chwang is regarded as a severe blow to Russia.

General Kuropatkin's telegram recording the withdrawal of the southern army from Ta Tche Kiao to Hai Cheng fails to give details of the continuous rear guard action preceding the retreat, but the war office thinks the losses were several hundred, which would indicate pretty severe fighting.

General Kuropatkin does not mention the number of troops engaged, but the presence of General Zaroubaieff and General Stakelberg, both corps commanders, show that the total must have been large, though inferior to the forces of Generals Oku and Nodzu.

It is supposed in Russian military circles that General Kuropatkin will withdraw to Mukden and there await reinforcements.

DEWEY AND HIS MEN.

Awarded Prize Money by the District of Columbia Court.

After a legal battle of several years Admiral Dewey and his men, who fought the battle of Manila, are to receive their prize money on account of the capture of the Don Juan de Austria and other Spanish property. In the supreme court of the District of Columbia Justice Gould signed an order confirming the report of the auditor in the case, overruling all exceptions filed by either side to the report.

The amount of the property captured finally was fixed at $1,657,355, a sum considerably in excess of what the government claimed to be due. One-half the amount will be paid the captors, while the remainder, as provided by law, will be placed to the credit of the navy pension fund.

GREAT WESTERN FLOOD

Douglass and Silver Star, Nev., in Water's Path.

Telephone Wire to Sodaville Gives the News and Then Breaks Down—People Asked to Look For Bodies.

Reno, Nev.—As a result of a cloudburst the towns of Douglass and Silver Star, near Sodaville, Nev., are reported to have been swept away. The news was telephoned from the scene of the disaster to Sodaville. The report was that a flood in waves four or five feet deep was sweeping away houses, and that great property damage was being wrought. The schoolhouse and four dwellings were swept away.

Ten minutes after the first news was received at Sodaville the wire went down, and it could not be learned how many lives were lost. There is great excitement at Sodaville, as the people have been warned to watch for bodies. The volume of water is increasing at that place.

Near New Boston, six miles north of Sodaville, the Carson and Colorado Railroad is covered with water to a depth of six inches for half a mile, and at Rhodes, three miles south of here, similar conditions prevail.

Kingman, Ariz.—Heavy rains in the mountains east of Truxton sent down a wall of water thirty feet high through the canon, washing out the Santa Fe Railroad track, embankments, bridges, telegraph poles and everything movable for twelve miles. Great steel bridges were taken from their foundations and piled up against the walls of the canon and massive stone abutments were crumbled and carried away.

At Crozier everything movable, including the station signal and box cars were piled up on the big steel bridge west of the station. At Hackberry the pumping house and machinery were destroyed and swept into the valley miles away. The big well was filled to the brim with debris. Houses high above all known high water marks heretofore were flooded and much damage was done.

Hundreds of men have been hurried to the washout by the Santa Fe Railroad, but it will be some time before the water subsides sufficiently to allow the workmen to reconstruct the roadbed and bridges. Many trains bearing men and material have been running from Seligman and Needles to the washout, and it is expected that the work of repair will go on at once. Many miles of telegraph lines are down and it will take some time to repair them.

Three miles of the Arizona and Utah track were washed out, and it will take several days to make repairs. A report reaches Kingman of a cloudburst at Cedar, a mining camp eighty miles south of here, which carried away part of a twenty-stamp mill, gasolene pump engine, blacksmith shop, forty horsepower boiler and other property. The shaft of the Arnold mine was filled with debris.

BABY DOWN FORTY FOOT WELL

Fished Out Alive With Grappling Hooks After Two Hours.

Jackson, Miss. — While L. Vail, a farmer living in Montgomery County, was boring a well which had reached a depth of about forty feet, his eighteen-months-old child toddled out into the yard and tumbled headforemost to the bottom of the hole.

Grappling hooks were secured and an effort made to draw the child out. The cries of the infant could be plainly heard at the top, and hundreds of neighbors, who gathered after the news of the accident spread, were frantic in their efforts to save the baby. A hold was finally secured on the infant's clothing, but when the tiny body was within ten feet of the top the hooks loosened and the child again slowly slipped to the bottom. After working for nearly two hours the child was finally brought to the surface nearer dead than alive.

Indiana Man Suspects Secret Enemy of New Idea of Assassination.

Louisville, Ky.—An assassination plot in which a deadly viper was to bite the victim is reported by Clarence Norris, who lives near Jeffersonville, Ind.

Mrs. Donahue, a neighbor, telephoned Mr. Norris that she had noticed a big snake on his gate. Mr. Norris hurried to the gate and found that a viper, over three feet long, had been fastened to the barrier, with its head on the latch. The snake had been so arranged that it would scarcely be noticed from the inside.

After killing the snake Mr. Norris found that it had been securely fastened by a nail driven through its tail. Mr. Norris suspects an unknown enemy, and the police are working on the case.

CZAR'S MINISTER KILLED

M. de Plehve Assassinated in St. Petersburg Thoroughfare.

BLOWN TO PIECES BY A BOMB

The Assassin Badly Wounded by His Own Weapon in Custody of Police—Explosion Kills Minister's Coachman and Injures Others—Is Felt For Blocks—Czar Deeply Affected by the Affair.

St. Petersburg, Russia. — M. de Plehve, the Minister of the Interior, was assassinated by means of a bomb thrown at his carriage while he was driving to the Baltic Station to take a train for the palace at Peterhof, where he was to make his weekly report to the Emperor.

The assassination is believed to be the outcome of a widespread plot, the existence of which had been suspected for several days. Numerous arrests have already been made, including that of the assassin, a young man who is believed to be a Finn named Leglo, and who is now in a hospital, severely and perhaps mortally injured by the explosion of his own bomb.

An accomplice of Leglo, also apparently a Finn, but whose name is unknown, has been arrested. He had in his possession a bomb, which he tried to throw, but he was overpowered by the police just in time to prevent great loss of life.

The assassin, who wore a brown overcoat and a railroad official's cap, stood on the sidewalk just as M. de Plehve's carriage was about to cross the canal bridge near the station. The Minister was escorted by a number of detectives on bicycles, and one of them jostled the assassin, who then rushed into the road and threw the bomb after the carriage, crying "Long live freedom!"

The missile struck the hind wheel and exploded with fearful force, killing or wounding over a score of persons. M. de Plehve and his coachman were killed outright; and an officer of the guard was mortally injured.

One of the cyclist detectives arrested the assassin, who endeavored to escape, though wounded by splinters in the face, arm and abdomen.

The explosive is believed to have been pyroxylin, as it gave off little smoke. The force of the explosion was so terrific that it not only broke every window within a radius of half a mile, but reduced the heavy paving stones to powder, heaved up the pavement, and flung a heavy piece of the ironwork of the carriage across the canal, severing the thick mast of a barge, which fell, stunning the captain of the barge. Everybody in the street was knocked down and more or less bruised.

Immediately there ensued a scene of the wildest confusion. Police and gendarmes hurried up from every direction and vast crowds gathered about the spot where the body of the Minister lay. It had been partially covered with a police officer's overcoat.

A few yards from M. de Plehve's body lay the coachman's remains.

The news of the tragedy spread like wildfire throughout St. Petersburg, causing consternation everywhere. Police reserves were hurried to the scene from all parts of the city.

Guarded by the police, the body remained in the street until the arrival of the judicial officials, even in the case of the most powerful Minister of the empire, the law requiring that this formality be observed before the body could be removed.

When the officers of the law, headed by Minister of Justice Muravieff, had terminated the necessary formalities by drawing up a written report of the crime, the remains were conveyed to an humble chapel adjoining the station. The priests and people, with characteristic Russian piety, at once joined in a solemn requiem.

The body was then placed in a carriage, covered by a robe, and was taken to the deceased's magnificent town residence, adjoining the Ministry of the Interior, where it was completely covered with a write shroud which concealed the ghastly mutilation. It lay in a black and silver casket in a corner of the vast hall surrounded by luxuriant palms.

The news was broken to the Minister's wife at Kybinsk, on the Volga, while on her way to their country seat with their son, who is thirty-seven years old.

The Czar almost broke down when he was informed of the Minister's murder.

The Czarina was not informed of the tragedy in view of the hourly expectation of the birth of an heir to the throne.

WOMEN WORKERS AT POLLS.

Fair Sex Takes Prominent Part in Wilmington, N. C., Election.

Wilmington, N. C.—Women took an active part in the municipal election held here under the Watts State law, upon the question of the establishment of a dispensary in the city and the operation of distilleries within the corporate limits.

Near the polling places booths had been erected from which the ladies served refreshments to all dispensary workers. The anti-dispensary advocates won the election by a majority of 690 in a total vote of 1912, and in the operation of distilleries there was a majority of 461. In the morning there was a parade of boys by the polls carrying banners proclaiming against the saloon.

Plunger Charged With Larceny of $800,000 at St. Louis.

Arrested at Brighton Beach Race Track as His Horse Won Thousands For Him—Bail Accepted at $5000.

New York City.—John J. Ryan, race-track plunger, promoter of "get-rich-quick" schemes and owner of outlaw tracks, was arrested at the Brighton Beach, near here, on a warrant issued at the instance of District Attorney Folk, of St. Louis, charging Ryan with the embezzlement of $800,000.

Had Detective Sergeant Valley, who came down with a brother officer from Police Headquarters, planned the arrest of the plunger with a view to its dramatic effect, he could not have succeeded better.

The field for the third race, a selling affair at one and one-sixteenth miles, was lined up behind the barrier waiting for the starter to send it away. Among the horses was the black gelding Monster, carrying the green jacket and the green banknotes of John J. Ryan, his owner.

Just as the grandstand proclaimed the old, but always thrilling, announcement, "They're off!" the detective stepped up to the plunger, who was standing with field glasses in hand on the brick knoll in front of the betting ring.

"They want you up at headquarters, Mr. Ryan," he explained, showing his order of arrest.

"Be with you in a second," Ryan replied, cheerfully. "He got away nicely, didn't he?" and he levelled his glass on the field of galloping thoroughbreds.

Monster was in third position then and was going strong and easily.

"Why, he'll gallop—there's nothin' to it," Ryan yelled, forgetting in the superior exhilaration of seeing his horse win the petty annoyance of a warrant; "he'll make that mare curl up before they hit the stretch—he'll walk home!"

Monster did not fulfil the prophecy literally, but he won the race very comfortably, and when the numbers had been run up and the red board confirmed the placing of the first three horses Ryan turned to the detective. "If you'd come a minute sooner," he explained, regrettfully, "I'd have put you wise. I got 9 to 5 for most of mine!"

Earlier in the day Assistant Circuit Attorney Fickerson, of St. Louis, in company with a detective, had gone to Police Headquarters and presented an order of requisition from Governor Dockery of Missouri for Ryan's apprehension, and on this the warrant was issued. It charged him with grand larceny and embezzlement and was dated July 23.

As Valley was taking his prisoner from the track Ryan espied Daniel O'Reilly, ex-Assistant District Attorney, on the brick lawn. "Dan," he called to him, "I'm in a bit of trouble, and I wish you'd come along with me."

O'Reilly joined him, and the party went to Police Headquarters, where Ryan's "pedigree was taken." He said he was thirty-nine years old, and gave his occupation as horse racing. Later he was released on $5000 bail, the amount fixed by Justice Amend, in the Supreme Court. The bond was furnished by Congressman Timothy D. Sullivan.

Assistant Circuit Attorney Fickerson said at the Waldorf that about eighteen months ago St. Louis seemed the headquarters of a number of "get-rich-quick" concerns, which tricked people all over the country. Ryan, he said, started a kind of co-operative racing syndicate, and advertised in small papers throughout the country, asking people to invest as stockholders, promising big dividends on racing schemes, and saying he had a scheme as an expert bookmaker for beating the races. Ryan issued a lot of stock, Fickerson said, and gave bits of paper for stock to the victims, who received, said the St. Louis official, about fifteen cents on the dollar.

President to Meet Run Missed Train, But Auto Saved Him.

Columbus, Ohio.—With $35,000 in gold C. P. Cole, President of the Lancaster Bank, made a dash in an automobile from Columbus to Lancaster, arriving in time to prevent the bank from closing its doors in the face of a run.

Hearing by telephone of the trouble, Mr. Cole secured the money from the Ohio National Bank in Columbus, but missed his train. He hired an automobile and made the run of forty-eight miles in one hour and twenty-eight minutes.

FARM AND GARDEN

VARIETIES AND PLANTING.

Newer kinds of potatoes are introduced every year, and many experiments have been conducted at the several stations with the view of discovering remedies for diseases, modes of planting, characteristics of seed and varieties, etc., with the result of much valuable information being disseminated every year. In one of the Government bulletins is was stated that the best soil for potatoes is a rich, sandy loam, well drained and which is abundantly supplied with vegetable matter. Green manures and fertilizers are consequently very suitable for a crop. It is better not to grow potatoes on the same land every year but alternate with other crops. Fertilizer should be applied to the previous crop, rather than on the potato land. The preparation of the land should be deep and thorough, and the fertilizers consist of nitrate of soda, superphosphate and sulphate of potash. Planting depends on the climate, but should be done, if possible, so as to bring the period when the average rainfall is ample. On mellow soil from three to five inches deep is best for planting, especially if the season is dry, but on earlier crops, or in soils that bake, the depth may be less. Harrow well before the plants are up, as level culture has given the best results. Seed may be cut a few days before planting without injury, and New England seed has proved superior to that grown in this section. The eyes on the seed end are the first to germinate, hence are best for an early crop. The yield from planting the seed or bud end is generally greater than from the stem or butt end of the tuber. Exposing unsprouted tubers in a warm place before planting hastens growth, but if continued until sprouts form (which are rubbed off) the yield may be considerably reduced. It is better to cut the pieces of seed into uniform sizes, and which a definite number of eyes, than to cut them indiscriminately as to sizes, and two or three eyes should be the quota for each piece.

A COMFORTABLE COOP.

We must not forget to provide suitable quarters for the hen with her brood of chickens. Various and curious is the collection of contrivances for enclosing the mother hen. Empty half barrels set upright with alternate staves on one side cut to allow chicks to run out and back; boxes of numerous kinds; "A" shaped coops and other devices are in use. Sometimes the hen is left to find any shelter that she can. A coop two feet square, two feet high in front, one and one-half feet at the back with a single pitch roof produces a safe and economical home for the mother hen and her little flock. The front of the coop has a slatter door or a frame door covered with one inch mesh wire netting. A shutter hinged at top may be provided for protecting the front of the coop at night and during bad weather. It may be fastened up for shading the front of the coop when the sunshine is too hot. If cats or hawks are likely to disturb the chickens a connecting yard at one or both sides of the coop, one foot high, two wide and three or six feet long, enclosed and covered with wire netting will keep in the chicks and exclude their enemies. Both coop and yard-frame should be made of light lumber so as to be readily moved to fresh ground. They must be placed where the chicks can keep dry under foot. An excellent plan is to place several coops for hens near together, letting the chicks intermingle from the first.—John M. Kester, in The Epitomist.

DEEP AND SHALLOW PLOWING.

The finer the condition of the soil the easier the facilities allowed the plants for feeding, and the greater the feeding room the greater the quantity of roots, which are essential during times of drought and lack of moisture, to say nothing of the vigorous growth and rapid progress of the corn by reason of its greater root surface. Many controversies regarding deep and shallow plowing would perhaps find an amicable solution if the nature of the soil and method of plowing were considered in exact relation to each other Some farmers have found deep plowing highly advantageous, especially on clay soils, simply because the roots were permitted to search through a larger quantity of soil for food, and also to more easily procure moisture from below as well as though absorption of moisture by the soil. Other farmers have found deep plowing highly advantagable especially on light soils which assist in the establishment of a greater mass of roots near the surface while the porocity of the soil and its light nature enable the corn to go downward as easily as may be desired.

BREEDING CORN.

Much has been said and written of late in regard to the improvement of corn by selection of seed, and there is no doubt that by proper breeding the corn can be greatly increased independently of the improvement of the soil. But both should go hand in hand. Most of the so-called corn breeders give a great deal of attention to the character of the ear and grain, and these are important points. But the breeding of any plant that looks simply to the improvement of a single feature of the plant can never be successful as one that takes the whole plant into consideration. In breeding corn one must know what his particular section needs. If he is in the region of short season and early frost, he must take earliness of the plant into serious consideration, as well as its productiveness. If he is in the South where he has time enough to mature any variety of corn, he need give attention only to the character of the plant and its productiveness.

FIND CALVES NOW.

People in buying a place will refuse one without a spring to keep their milk in; yet they make no preparation for it in the winter. It freezes or not as it happens; they save the strippings and keep them in a hot place and churn in a five gallon churn for two or three hours and then get a white puffy mass they call butter. They let the children do the milking and wonder how I can have butter and milk all winter. In the first place our cow finds her calf in July or August and then she is good for all winter; then when other people's cows are going dry (in eight or nine months,) here comes grass so she gives milk all the year. In the winter I have a little cupboard fixed under the chimney (or flue) and it keeps about the same temperature and is just right. I keep four jars setting and skim the oldest (unless sweet milk is wanted) in a half gallon jar, and when that's full I churn all cream. The butter comes in a few minutes. I make enough for our family of three and two other families, and I know there is no use going without milk and butter in the winter—Mrs. E. J. Holland, The Epitomist.

TO HALTER A HOG.

To tie a hog is one of the most difficult things in the hog raiser's experience. To tie by the leg requires a rope or strap to be drawn up so tight as to cause pain if not real injury. Now try this plan: take a horse halter, slip over the hog's head stall securely around the hog just back of fore legs, and you have him safely haltered, and in a way he cannot hurt himself. Then holding the strap and walking behind you can readily drive it anywhere desired—Lewis S. Alter, in The Epitomist.

THE ONE-HORSE PLOW

Having the ideal corn plant, the next important thing in the production of big crops is the preparation of the land, the feeding of the crop. The one-horse plow has been the cause of more poor crop than any one other thing. The gullies in hills have been largely due to the scratch plowing of the past. The shallow plowed soil fills with water and runs off on the hard soil below and a gully is started and is annually enlarged by the frosts of winter. We need deeper breaking of the soil to enable it to hold more water for the crop and to withstand droughts and to prevent washing.—Progressive Farmer.

FARM NOTES.

In selecting a good milker the udder should be large and capacious, but it need not only be fleshy. It should be broad and reach well forward.

To a very considerable extent, and on consequent profitableness of the flocks.

Uusually it is not good economy to turn the horses in the pastures all night They will rarely secure the rest they need from the work during the day.

There is no feed that is more digestible than gluton food, but if too much is fed it makes soft butter. From two to four pounds a day may be fed without fear of this.

Wait until there is fair bite of grass before turning the cows out, and then give them two hours a day on pasture for a few days, with good clover and a grain ration for the remainder of their feed.

It is better to cut seed potatoes a few days before they are planted, in order to give the surfaces time to dry. It is also a good plan to expose seed potatoes to the light for a few days before planting.

Success or failure of the poultry season depends upon the days and nights now passing.

Don't forget lime and gravel. Both are necessary in the poultry yard.

Be sure of clean water for the chicks and keep their roosting places clean.

Feed coops are very necessary to keep the large chicks and fowls from tramping the little ones to death.

When a polar bear is killed by an Eskimo, it is customary to cut off the animal's nose and throw it on the ice. If he failed to do this, it is the popular belief that he would have bad luck. This is the reason why nearly all the skins of polar bears are mutilated at the point about the snout.

A Japanese private soldier is paid 70 cents a month; a major general is paid $131 a month.

Timely Fashion Hints

New York City.—Young girls are always charming when wearing full waists made of soft material. This one is peculiarly attractive and includes an oddly shaped yoke which is eminently becoming and which gives the drooping shoulder line. As shown the material is embroidered batiste, with yoke and cuffs of Valenciennes lace finished with little ruches of plain muslin, and is unlined, but there are innumerable fabrics which are equally appropriate. Many simple silks of the season are quite sufficiently youthful and such light weight wools as challie and veiling will be worn the season through in addition to the large number of cotton and linen fabrics offered.

MISSES' BLOUSE WAIST.

The waist consists of the fitted lining, front and backs with the yoke and is closed invisibly at the back. When lined the yoke can be left free at the lower edge if preferred, but when the lining is omitted it is attached permanently at its lower edge on indicated lines. The sleeves are the favorite ones of the season and at the waist is worn a soft crushed belt.

The quantity of material required for the medium size (14 years) is four and one-eighth yards twenty-one inches wide, three and one-eighth yards twenty-seven inches wide or one and seven-eighth yards forty-four inches wide, with three-quarter yards of all-over lace and three-eighth yards of silk for belt.

Belts Made of Cowhide.

A distinct feature of the up-to-date masculine costume for the summer of 1904 is to be the cowhide belt. It is narrow, not more than one and a half inches wide, and is made of cowhide with the hair on. The irregular brown and white colorings are odd and striking. Also a fad of the season is the handkerchief in colored effects to match the shirt worn, whatever that may be. These come both in linen and silk. The self-color shades included are light blue, heliotrope, pale green, very deep pink and champagne. Equally expensive, though perhaps in better taste, are fine white handkerchiefs, hemstitched and having a border of fine cords forming plaids.

A Lingerie Novelty.

One of the daintiest lingerie petticoats has a deep flounce made up of row upon row of narrow Valenciennes lace stitched together. A deep flounce on another skirt is composed of alternate rows of lace footing and tucked French nainsook.

Parasols Are Plain.

Plain styles are noticeable among the parasols carried by fashionable women. Tucked effects have been very good this season.

Washable Petticoats.

The petticoats of the coming season, since the rage of cleanliness is on the increase, are preferably of wash materials. Tinted chambrays, tucked and lace trimmed, are used for those destined for the hardest wear, but the petticoat for dressy use is invariably of white.

Square Yoke Waist.

Square yolks are exceedingly fashionable and suit some figures and faces better than any other sort. This very pretty waist includes one that extends over the shoulders, after the prevailing style, and can be made slightly low, as illustrated, or high, with a regulation stock. The model is made of sheer white batiste, with the yoke and cuffs of represe net banded with lace insertion, the lining beneath the yoke being cut away to give a transparent effect, but the design is suited to all seasonable materials thin enough to be made full and various combinations can be made. All-over lace, of many sorts, fine tucking and the many combinations of bandings with fancy stitches all are admirable for yoke and cuffs, while the trimming can be one of many things.

The lace is made with full front and backs which are arranged over a lining that is smooth at the upper portion but gathered at the waist line to blouse with the waist. The yoke is separate, arranged over the waist on indicated lines, and the sleeves are full puffs finished with fitted cuffs and can be either arranged over the foundation or left unlined as liked.

The quantity of material required for the medium size is four and one-quarter yards twenty-one inches wide, three and five-eighth yards twenty-seven inches wide or two and one-quarter yards forty-four inches wide, with one yard eighteen or half-yard forty inches wide for yoke and cuffs and four and a half yards of banding to trim as illustrated.

GERM FEAR IS A CRAZE.

PUBLIC FRANTICALLY DEMANDING DEVICES FOR PROTECTION.

The Antiseptic Fad Is a Feature of the Twentieth Century—Millions of Germs Destroyed Daily, but Science Finds New Millions.

Germ fear is a feature of the 20th century, declares the New York Tribune. There is an antiseptic or germ destroying craze. The public, or a part of it awakened, at last, to the existence and the peril of germs, demands—a little too frantically, perhaps—germ protection.

In response to this demand there are offered to the public many strange and ingenious devices. The object of these devices is the prevention of all such diseases as arise from the swallowing of germs, or their touch, or their inhalation. Thus:

There are on the market money scoops—silver instruments of pocket size—wherewith to handle unsterilized coins.

There are germicide doormats. These, being stepped upon in the right spot, emit a spray of highly volatile fluid that is supposed to render harmless the millions of disease germs gathered on the shoes amid the dust and mud of the cities.

There are wind veils, for men no less than women, to be worn over the mouth and nose as a preventive of the inhalation of germs.

There are fumigating attachments for letter boxes. These, on being compressed, are guaranteed to sterilize the recipient's mail before he touches it.

There are hanging tabular baths for hallways. The ends of canes and umbrellas, dipped in these baths, come forth clean of germs.

There are aseptic communion cups, with tiny rotating brushes that wash the cups' edges as they pass from one communicant to another.

There are generators that sterilize carpets, walls, clothing, books, etc.

There are pocket lamps that emit a germ killing vapor. These are for the cleansing of cups at public drinking fountains and for other such purposes.

It may be doubted if so great a fear of germs as all these devices indicate is altogether sane. But it is at any rate, a fear that does more good than harm. Between the general sanitary conditions of the present and the past the contrast is amazing, and in the bringing about of that contrast the public fear of germs plays its part.

In one of the London hospitals they still preserve as a relic a bed 14 or 15 feet wide. In that bed in the past a dozen patients would lie side by side, one with consumption, another with smallpox, a third with typhoid fever, and so on. It is different today. Today contagion and infection are guarded against as thoroughly as thieves are guarded against by misers. And still these precautions increase. Every month, every week, some new preventive of the spread of disease is devised.

And there has sprung up the germ hunter—the health faddist—who hunts germs as a sportsman hunts game. Innumerable are the weapons wherewith the germ hunter seeks his prey. A good pdace to examine these weapons is a surgical instrument shop.

A surgical instrument dealer, on being asked to exhibit his various germ destroyers, pointed to a doormat. It was like any other doormat of rubber, only a lemon shaped rubber bulb was attached to it.

"What," said the visitor, "is that bulb for?"

"I'll show you," the dealer answered.

He stood upon the mat and he compressed the bulb with his toe. Immediately a silver colored mist arose. For an instant he stood in this mist ankle deep. Then, as quickly as it had arisen the mist disappeared, leaving the man's shoes and the bottoms of his trousers quite dry.

"Did you notice that spray of volatile fluid?" he said. "Well, that was a spray of germicide, or disinfectant. This is a patent germicide doormat. This mat cleans your feet when you come in of the disease germs gathered in the mud and dust."

"A remarkable mat," said the visitor. "Does it sell?"

"It sells well," the other answered. "All germ killing devices sell well in this age. This is the age of germ fear."

He took from a case an armful of glittering objects. They were of glass and silver, and their shapes were strange."

"All these instruments," he said, "kill germs or ward off germs. I will explain them to you."

He pointed to a small silver scoop.

"That is a money scoop," he said. "A number of health faddists carry scoops in their pockets. They know that the average coin has on it about a million germs—germs of consumption, of smallpox, of typhoid, of diphtheria—and therefore they will not touch a coin with their fingers until it has been sterilized. When you give them change they receive it in their scoops instead of in their hands. Thence it goes into their sterilized purses, to be thoroughly fumigated at home. I know three men and two women who use these money scoops. The scoops are made of silver and they cost a dollar apiece."

He took up a tiny lamp—a lamp with two wicks that rose out of a cake of sulphur. In the middle of the cake of sulphur there was a vial of transparent fluid.

"This is a pocket fumigator," he said. "You take the stopper from the vial and light the two wicks, and thereupon a vapor deadly to every kind of germs arises. The pocket fumigator is applied by the germ hunter to the public drinking cups in railway stations, to plates and goblets in dubious restaurants, to towels in doubtful hotels. The germ hunter knows that many persons have contracted incurable and dreadful diseases from the use of public cups and towels. He knows that a small towel may have a germ population as great as the human population of the earth. Hence you see him, in a washroom at a railway station, bringing forth a lamp, lighting it, and directing the rather vile smelling vapor on the towel or cup he purposes to use. He bends over his task with intent brow and pays no attention to the inquiring stares of the people. He is often interrupted by ignorant policemen or special officers who say:

"'Here, what are you doing with that cup?' or 'Do ye want to set the house on fire, mister?'"

The dealer, smiling, sets down the lamp down.

"This object here is a germ proof wind veil," he said.

The wind veil had meshes very fine—it rather resembled a bridal veiling—and in the back it hooked.

"If, on a windy day," said the dealer, "you examine under the microscope a cubic inch of the air of the average city, you find that this air is a squirming, writhing mass of dangerous germs. The germs of consumption predominate in that mass; more than half of them are tubercle bacilli, or consumption germs. It is therefore a good thing, if you are afraid of consumption, to wear on windy days a germproof wind veil. Without this veil you are bound to take down into your lungs millions of consumption germs. You wouldn't put a hungry cat in a room with a raw beefsteak if you wanted the beefsteak to remain intact, yet you put down in your lungs swarms of tubercle bacilli, though you know that the destruction of lungs tissue is the sole object of these terrible little creatures' lives.

"In that way," said the dealer, "the faddist argues, and on windy days he wears his wind veil. I know three men in New York, four in Chicago and two in Philadelphia who wear these veils. The veils, each time they are taken off, are washed in a sterilized solution.

"We have generators," he went on, "of all sizes. Some cost $2, and some cost $50. Here is a generator that looks like a small stove or like an overright chafing dish, doesn't it? You feed it with this fluid, light it up, and it emits a germ destroying vapor. People with these instruments fumigate sick rooms, carpets, clothing, books, paper money, and so on. I know a man whose clothes are fumigated daily."

The dealer laughed. He gathered the germ killing devices and put them back upon their shelves.

RADIUM MAY HEAT THE EARTH

Young British Scientist Startles and Interests With a New Theory.

The New York Herald's European edition publishes the following from its London correspondent:

Is the heat of the earth due not to the fact that it is not a molten mass which has been slowly cooling for millions of years, but to the presence in it of that mysteriously fascinating element radium?

Prof. Ernest Rutherford, a young but already distinguished pupil of Prof. J. J. Thomson of Cambridge, who first measured the mass and velocity of radium electrons, threw out the latter suggestion in a lecture before the Royal Institution on a recent night.

Lord Kelvin had calculated that assuming the earth to be a molten mass when it first started its own career it would take one hundred million of years to cool down to its present temperature, but, added the lecturer, inclining his head toward the white headed scientist, who was present, Lord Kelvin had shown a prophetic insight when he added, "Provided no new source of heat is not discovered."

Mr. Rutherford thought that radium was proved to be in sufficient quantities in the earth to support new theory as to the source of the earth's heat, so that we should not require the many millions of years which geologists and biologists had reasoned out as the time taken in the cooling process before life on the globe was possible.

This startling new theory, very modestly, was not discussed after the lecture, but the scientists went away greatly interested in a proposition which in effect means a reconstruction of hitherto accepted facts.

The Daily Mail points out that Rutherford's calculation leads to the conclusion that the earth may have been habitable for many millions of years, and that it further upsets the accepted theories as to the duration of life, since a millionth portion of radium only exhausts itself in a million years.

Courting a Girl in Spain.

Courting in Spain is conducted on principles that might almost be described as unique. The Spanish girl of any attractions is almost always attended by a young man who is known as her novio, and who has the privilege of squiring her on her walks, although by a singular anomaly no formal engagement exists. So long as this state of things continues the young lady has to be loyal and obedient to her gallant. But he may cease his attentions at any time and openly transfer his attentions to some other lady. Although the advantages of such a custom are all on the side of the male, very few English girls would care to be without a novio, however fickle.—London Tit-Bits.

A PERFECT DISAPPEARANCE.

By TALBOT SMITH.

THE long and sensational trial was over, and, in spite of the earnest, whole-hearted attempts of the prisoner's counsel, had terminated in the only possible verdict. All over for Winthrop Lyle. The judge, in a queer, quavering whisper, drawn on the fatal headgear of in a manner to suit his peculiar and spoken these words which the most callous cannot hear unmoved, for the next twenty-four the doomed man was walking the stricken path of the Valley of Shadow. From that awe-inspiring fact Winthrop Lyle was no longer human. A metamorphosis had made the convict into a being whose feet already knocking at the Eternal gate.

The condemned man heard the verdict unmoved, save for a tremulous movement of the lips, which the most restrained can never wholly hide, passed down those footworn steps many unfortunates have trod to the apportioned him. Here, by special permission of the Judge, he had an interview with his brother without the presence of a watching warder.

"I expected nothing better," said the latter, "and nothing remains for me but preparation for the end so near at hand." This was said in a voice in order that the warder standing outside the door, which was ajar, should hear and form a misconclusion.

As Eustace Lyle left the prison he had with him, and concealed in an pocket, a letter which Winthrop had written when the case seemed hopeless, and had managed to slip unobserved into his hand. Not until he was alone again and behind a locked door did he venture to read it. It ran thus:

"On the day of execution comes I shall be far away from this place—or dead. I want you to do one thing and one another. Leave $10,000 with Roger Roome, to be given to any one who asks for it, be he beggar, tramp or gentleman. And promise me that no escape no one of my family will make the slightest effort to find me or follow me.

"All other means of escape are out of question. I shall be shepherded night and day by two armed warders, who are relieved at intervals of four hours. I know, and you will yourself see, that doors are to be opened only from the outside, and were I to succeed in overpowering the guards and opening the door, some twelve other locked gates would have to be negotiated before I breathed the outside air.

"I have calculated the periods of duty for each of the six men told off for 'associated cell duty," as it is called. The two warders, Cox and Foster, are good men, will be my guard from 6 to 11 a. m. on Sunday next. I shall be at exercise in the prison yard. You must get at these men, not bribably, but by ordinary courtesy. Use The King's Crown, and, judging from experience while here, smoke a good cigar. Spin a yarn and offer cigars to be purchased on Monday, or the day after to-morrow, and wish to share the delicacies with them. You need make no secret of friendship. Give them a dozen each on Sunday morning as they pass the outside gates. Their hours of duty are from 8 to 12. I shall breakfast after breakfast, as I am personally, and as all will be safe in the central corridor, will persuade them to join me. They will, for the sake of my undoctored cheroot will be an acceptable lever.

"Should any one does not take action in from ten to ninety minutes, according to the dose. This will bring us to the hour of exercise. So far so good. Then listen. The foreman of the jail has a sick wife and a screaming baby. Approach him, offer him a present set-off to pay and pension on condition that when at work to-morrow the brickwork of the wall they are mending may be loosened; this alone is insufficient alone, but the ladders used in working hours are inadvertently left behind overnight for the night. You can trust me. The foreman gets the cross neglect of duty," and I am smoking on my comfortable bed. Well, I—never mind. The news of my flight reaches you all upon me as dead and buried in the Churchyard. In fact, it will help you to do otherwise.

The ship was in good spirits at the visit, and kept in the same mood for the next days, in spite of the trying scenes with his friends and relations.

The family, wealthy and powerful, was bent on preventing by any means the disgrace of the scaffold. It was a great triumph for justice when the intrigue and the skill of the lawyers came to naught in court and elsewhere. Even public opinion, won to sympathy by the brilliant struggle which Lyle made for his life, by his talent, his spirit, his beauty of face and manner, his steady and solemn declarations of innocence, was resisted and overcome by the officers of justice.

The care taken to prevent a prisoner under sentence of death from escape or suicide is very thorough, but it reminds one of the care taken by railway companies to prevent accidents. No matter how perfect the system, it depends on men for success, and engine drivers will drink, signalmen fall asleep, telegraph clerks miss the right word and guards fail to swing a warning lantern.

Everything worked successfully. Wealth and the rank of the convict achieved wonders, and an escape which read more like a romance of Dumas than a chronicle of Newgate occupied public attention for the usual nine days. Every one remembers the stir created by Lyle's disappearance. The officials, mad with rage and shame, really exhausted the means at their command to find the criminal. Finally the case was put into the able hands of Detective Lord, one of the smartest and most vigilant men in the secret service.

His efforts came to naught within a year. Lord held on for six months longer, studying with infinite patience clews, actual and theoretic, that promised something. Lyle had vanished into thin air. Had he dissolved into elementary gases at the prison gates, he could not have left less trace of his path into the world. Not one clew ever led to any result, not even to a decent theory of his escape. Lord continued the pursuit out of pure fascination for a mystery which overtaxed his powers and took the edge off his natural shrewdness.

After resigning his post, and joining an orchestra as first violin—for faith in his abilities finally deserted him—this fascination accompanied him, and proved a great bore to his friends from the endless speculations it led him to indulge.

On his mantelpiece he kept a photograph of Winthrop Lyle, and the slim, hard figure, the pale, thin high-bred face, the severe expression and dark eyes had a prominent place in his sleeping and waking dreams. In the end no one took any interest in his cherished mystery, save the boy who played the 'cello in the orchestra.

It was always a great relief to Lord to turn from constant brooding on the tints of Lyle's picture to the society of the young musician; for Josef Ganz was a soft boned, easy young German, slow in speech and movement, given to song and laughter, fond of his wife and 'cello and baby; fonder of the Lyle problem than Lord himself.

When the boarding-house in which he lived, the day dreams and the world grew wearisome, the detective went over to his friend's house and spent a Sunday evening with Ganz. He had a cosey home, and its owners, its pictures, its very furniture, spoke of ease and comfort.

Josef was fair skinned, fat and jolly, and loved to sit with his baby or his 'cello at his right hand. His wife and child were plump and rosy, and even the gray professor father, with his habits of study and solemn expression, had a fat and contented air about him.

Not having been long in the country, they spoke English with a gentle accent. German pictures hung on the wall, and German colors were everywhere. Frau Ganz could not abide English cooking, and at her table were ever dressed the seasoned dishes of the Fatherland. When they sang songs or indulged in old memories, the little village near Munich was the theme. The one promise to baby to induce him to be good was a visit to Munich when he had come to be a man. Among these simple people Lord might talk his hobby to death and be listened to with reverence.

"It's so nice to hear a clever detective speak by the hour of a great murderer and villain," Frau Ganz said to her neighbors. The old professor did not pay much attention, while his son Josef was a tireless listener, and had many speculations on the plan of escape used by Lyle.

"I have a theory," began Josef slowly.

"What, another?" The detective laughed and the professor glanced irritably at his son.

"A new one," said Josef, placidly. "Some time, when I have fitted the joints, I will tell you how that Lyle escaped. He was no ordinary man, and when he disappeared, it was forever. It is an art to disappear well, and he must have been skilled in the art. I know its rules, and the principles on which these rules are based. It is curious and interesting, this art."

Lord felt curious about this matter, knowing that Ganz would make a clear, forcible statement of his theories. For he had studied logic and rhetoric at Innsbruck, and could put a case in which he was interested very strongly.

"There is such an art," Josef began, and your man Lyle was skilled in it. It would be a treat to hear him discourse on it."

"Wouldn't it, now," said Lord, with scorn. "Especially if, while listening, one had the reward of capturing him in his inside pocket. But that will never be."

"Probably not," said Josef, "unless he gets tired of hiding. You know, I always took an interest in the poor fellow. I seem to know him as well as you, so often have you described his words and ways. He was a thorough Englishman by birth, training, appearance, cleverness. Old family, high spirit and all that; Cambridge graduate, well dressed good figure, athletic; brown hair, green eyes, pale, severe face; quick in movement, speech and thought. Then he was inventive, fond of mathematics, also of pleasure, but cared nothing for music or wine or books. And he learned enough of drugs to poison his wife too cleverly."

"How could he have been so hard and cruel?" said Frau Ganz, with a sigh.

"I don't believe he did it," said Josef, softly. "His lawyers, the great public, his relatives, and many good people believed him innocent. Lord says the case got an awful sifting, and the more they sifted the less certain some were of his guilt, while others were more certain."

"But the art, the art!" cried the impatient detective.

"Ah, yes, the art, to be sure. Well, first, have I described Lyle accurately? I might say he was just the opposite to myself in most things."

"Two young men," answered Lord, "couldn't be and look, less alike."

Josef smiled.

"I arrived in this country about the time he escaped from jail. I could read English then, and, I remember, the newspapers were full of him. But until I met you the case did not interest me. Let me show you what the principle forces a man to do, when it is successfully carried out. You think it means running away to Brazil or Persia, in a wig and blue spectacles, as they do in a play. No. The man who disappears according to this principle, must escape, not only from his pursuers, but from his friends, and, above all, from himself. He must change his country, never meet old friends again, get a new language, a new trade, a new place in society, a new set of parents and relatives, a new past, a new habit of body, a new appearance. He must think, speak, walk, sleep, eat and drink differently from in past days; he must change the color of his hair, skin, eyes; in fact, he must become another man as really as if he had changed natures with a particular person."

"Der gondry is safe," said the professor, with a huge laugh, "und so is der brofession of detective. Who gould bragtise dose rules; und if dey gould, what use would be detectives?"

"It makes fine talk," said Lord. "All very well if such things could be done. As they can't, your theory isn't worth a straw. It's impossible."—New York Tribune.

Mother Elephant and Her Baby.

A remarkably intelligent elephant, working a few years ago on a new bridge in Ceylon, had a young one to whom she was devoted. It died, and she became inconsolable.

Formerly the gentlest of creatures, she grew irritable and even dangerous. One morning she broke the chain which confined her and escaped into the forest.

One night, about ten days after her escape, the officer who had been in charge of her went out to lie in wait for bears at a pond in a jungle at some distance.

As he and his native attendant were returning, early in the morning, the native silently nudged him, and they saw in the dim, gray light an elephant with her calf making their way toward the camp. They both sprang behind trees, and when the elephants had passed the native insisted that the older one was their old friend, the inconsolable mother.

When they reached the camp they found that the truant had returned, and had gone from one person to another, touching each with her trunk, as if exhibiting her adopted child, which she had evidently begged, borrowed or stolen in her absence.

Her good temper and usual docility returned at once, and her owner blessed the good fortune which had enabled her to procure a baby elephant.

Taking No Chances.

Phelim Casey was engaged on the ridgepole of 'Squire Pond's house when he lost his footing, and slid down to the edge of the roof. His legs went down, but he clutched the eaves trough and hung on for dear life.

"That's right, Phelim!" called the 'Squire, who had seen him slip. "You hang on a minute till I get a ladder up there!"

But even as he spoke Phelim relaxed his hold and dropped to the ground.

As soon as the 'Squire made sure that no bones were broken, and that Phelim was simply bruised here and there and shaken up, he began to berate the man in vigorous language.

"Why in the world didn't you hang on, as I told you to, you great stupid?" he demanded. "I'd have been there in a minute."

"Maybe you wul," said Phelim, sullenly, "but how did I know but the eaves would give way before you got there?"—Youth's Companion.

AN EXPERT GUN CREW ON THE MAINE AIMING AT A TARGET.

TRAINING GUNNERS IN THE NAVY

Our Battleships Breaking All Records in Shooting at a Target — Gun Pointers Selected After Rigid Trial —A Foreign Experiment in Shooting at a Battleship — The Value of Target Practice.

By Lieut.-Com. ALBERT GLEAVES,
Commanding U. S. S. Mayflower.

A REVIVAL of target practice dates from the Spanish-American War. Up to that time adequate attention had not been paid to the necessary training to produce expert results in any navy in the world, except possibly the French and Russian. Since that time, England and Germany have made important changes in their systems, and in the United States target practice has been carried on so assiduously that recently the American gunners established the best records that have ever been made. The Wisconsin first broke the record, and later the Texas shot even better.

Target practice in our navy is as old as the guns. We always devoted much time and attention to the guns, and in so doing we acquired a world-wide reputation in all our wars for excellent shooting.

In the beginning of the new century, when the infant navy of the United States first began to make itself heard in the West Indies and on the coast of Barbary, target practice—not the scientific drill of to-day, but none the less target practice, including shooting at beef casks—became throughout the navy a part of every ship's routine and our sailors were thus for years kept in training until the great struggle came with the acknowledged champions of the ocean. Up to that time only one English ship, the Shannon, had target practice, or put sights on her guns, and her reward came one eventful June day in Boston Bay ninety years ago, when she fought the Chesapeake.

The necessity for target practice was taught for all time on the bloody decks of the Guerriere, the Macedonian, the Java, and the Peacock. It matters not whether the gun in vogue is a carronade, a Dahlgren, or a modern high-powered rifle; unless it can be made to hit the target, it is absolutely useless. But it was not until the battle of the Yalu, in the Chinese-Japanese War, that heavy gun-practice was seriously considered. The value of the practice was proved at Manila and Santiago. The search of foreign experts for the best way to hit a mark resulted in the present system of target practice, generally the same in all navies, and brought to a high point of efficiency in ours.

It is only half the work to arm and equip ships with the most improved guns and sights; they must also have a highly trained personnel capable of manipulating guns, turrets, and torpedoes. When China found herself arrayed against Japan she offered $500 cash per month for skilled gun-pointers, but, in all great navies, gun-pointers are trained, not bought, and when the fight is on it is too late for instruction.

How does a man become an expert gunner? Diligent drill and constant training are not enough without a certain amount of natural aptitude. One man after another is tried. A few days' drill in the turrets eliminates all except the fairly promising. For the talent of eye and nerve which marks the born gun-pointer the Government pays from $2 to $10 a month in addition to the man's regular pay. This premium is not confined to any race, creed, or color. On one vessel in the navy one of the gun-pointers is a negro.

Selecting gun-pointers is one of the most important duties in the navy. Having selected the men for gun-pointers, the next step is to train them. Two methods are now in vogue, both having the same principle, but differing in detail. In the old days of sails and smooth-bore guns, the invariable rule—and the only rule the gun-captains knew—was this: "Fire at the top of the downward roll (just as the ship begins to roll toward the target), and aim at the enemy's waterline." This rule lasted far into the age of steam and turret guns, and has only recently been supplanted by "continuous-aim-firing," or the art of keeping a gun trained on the target regardless of the oscillations of the vessel, during the whole or a portion of the roll.

SILENT BRIDES OF KOREA.

Newly Made Husband May Not Hear His Wife's Voice For Months After His Marriage.

Here is a picture brought from the far east only a short time ago which shows exactly how the "silent brides," as those of Korea are called with so much reason, look on the wedding day. It may be said that although the robes depicted therein remind one somewhat of Japanese garments, the broad girdle with its enormous knot at the back, which is formed on the island girl's kimona, is not a part of the Korean belle's decoration, while the sleeves edged with deep white bands are much larger than those worn across the straits.

The headdress, a most important part of the quaint outfit, is peculiar to Korean brides. Made of heavy cloth carefully quilted and stiffened with a sort of canvas lining, it covers all except a very little of the hair and rises about a foot above the head. The large wooden pins at the back hold the headgear securely in place, the ribbon falling over the left shoulder being decorative only.

Dressed in this costume the young woman who, since her parents have arranged all her marriage affairs, perhaps never has seen her future husband, is led before the priest for a ceremony which probably has no equal for simplicity. At a word from the priest the contracting persons bow to each other slowly and solemnly and—all is over! Then the bride goes home to await further orders, while the husband, gathering about him all his friends and acquaintances, departs for an elaborate feast, which he gives in honor of himself.

Once married the bride's family identity at once sinks before her new name and she is never known except as So-and-So's wife. Her chief duty is to attend strictly to her own business, not speaking except when necessary. So firmly is this virtue impressed upon the young girl's mind that several months often pass before her husband hears his partner's voice, and where a father-in-law is one of the family whole years of almost absolute silence are said to elapse. Since the son has no say in choosing a wife or a daughter in chosing a husband, the parents are held responsible by the community for the proper marriage of their children. If a man allows his son to reach the age of twenty unmarried his neighbors consider him sadly lacking in his duty to his son.—Kansas City Star.

Restricted Height of Buildings.

The building regulations of Marseilles, France, provides that the height of buildings on streets more than thirty-two feet wide shall not be more than double the width of the street, with a maximum of eighty-one feet three inches.

SANITARY SOAP SERVER.

Prevents Contamination and Cuts Down Expense.

In this day and generation, when the enormous importance of sanitary conditions is so well recognized, it is difficult to reconcile the indifference of the public to numerous transgressions of the laws of hygiene and sanitation that are encountered daily. Soap in offices and other semi-public places may be cited as an instance. Powdered soap receptacles that furnish the user with a sufficient supply of soap without individual contamination are offered in a number of forms, but they are only occasionally met. The illustration shows an English type that has been adopted in the houses of Parliament and in many English hotels, which otherwise are notoriously behind the age in conveniences and comfort. The soap is put up in the form of a circular bar, perforated through the centre, is placed on a spindle and inserted through the top of the cylinder, which is locked to prevent pilfering and meddling. The end of the spindle which passes through the soap is cut with a fine thread, and is connected with a modified catchet wheel carrying four fine saws crossways at the bottom of the apparatus, which is open. By turning the cylinder the saws are brought into contact with the bar of soap, cutting away fine granulations, which drop into the hand placed to receive them. This soap cup, the manufacturers claim, effects a saving of seventy-five per cent. in the amount of soap ordinarily used, besides possessing essential sanitary advantages. Somewhat similar devices have been introduced in this country.—Philadelphia Record.

Leaf Tobacco For Export in Future.

"No more strips will be shipped to England," said T. B. Auchterlonie, of Liverpool, who is an official of the American tobacco trust and represents that concern in England. "The export of tobacco strips is practically at an end. The exporters cannot afford to ship the stripped leaf when the unstemmed leaf can be entered at English ports six cents lower. Leaf tobacco will be the thing for exports after this. And the North Atlantic ports will not lose the business, either. The rate in that direction is ten cents a hundred higher, I will admit, but ten cents a hundred pounds is nothing in comparison with the more rapid time which can be made by the North Atlantic ports."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

A Lepers' Mission.

The Presbyterian Mission at Canton, China, carried on a work among lepers which was originated by a poor blind and lame slave girl. This girl was brought to the mission for treatment, and abandoned by her mistress when it was discovered that she had leprosy. She was converted before she went to the leper settlement, and after that she became the centre of religious influences that have succeeded in reaching large numbers of these outcasts.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

There have been many complaints about the non-delivery of THE UNION, especially at the Clanton office; also about the condition the paper is in when delivered on some of the rural routes. Now, the general government pays these men, whether postmasters or carriers, to do this work in proper style, and hereafter any of our subscribers who does not receive paper or does not get it in good order as issued from this office, will please come to our office and we will take note of the facts and forward them to Washington.

The banner man.

Frank Crichton, the banner man, who was taken by the hand and put into business by the populists and republicans of this county and then showed his gratitude by selling them out to the enemy, has shown some more of his real nature in his last week's sheet. He says the —ERS had an election, using the phrase twice, thus slurring the people who took him as it were out of the gutter. Such animus! Just think! 965 American born citizens (not naturalized ones) exercising the highest privilege of a citizen of this country, and then to be called —ERS. The populist or republican that takes his dirty scurrilous sheet has not got his full allowance of proper pride. The banner man is full of gall and corruption. Nature is trying to relieve him of some of it, for he says he has an abscess? and he trys to get rid of the balance on his benefactors.

THE PRIMARY.

Our readers will find the tabulated statement of the vote cast on July 26th in this issue; also the county ticket at the head of this column, where it will stay until November 8th, completes the last formality to be observed. They are just as good as elected now, but we must respect the formalities prescribed by law. There are several good items concerning our primary. We polled a vote of 965 and among those we are glad to see most of the people who wandered out of the fold a few years back, such as Judge Honeycutt and Henry Honeycutt and others too numerous to mention, all of whom participated with us this time. There were a few "plated republicans" who did not vote, such as the Clanton postmaster, etc., but not enough to make a ripple on the surface. We could say more, but there are several letters in today's paper which cover the ground pretty well, notably those written by Hon. L. H. Reynolds, L. B. Pounds, J. Bice and M. A. Killgore.

Clanton, August 1, 1904.

Editor Union—Please allow me space for a few words to the public. First, I want to thank my friends who voted for me on the 26th of July. I feel as grateful to them as if I had received the nomination, and I want to say right here that I am perfectly satisfied. I want to thank my friends again for their support in 1900. I never forget a friend. I know a great many have it in for me for resigning the sheriff's office, but I can't help it; I've never regretted doing so yet. I only regret that circumstances were as they were. Now I've heard that some of the defeated candidates were not satisfied, so a word to them: Gentlemen, are you not willing to submit to the will of the people? You said if you weren't nominated that you would support the nominees, so now do it. If you don't, I want to tell you that I've no confidence in you. I say right here that I don't think I'll ever be before the people again for any office, but that is no reason why I should not have a choice as to those that will be. I am the same old Moses yet, and will be till death. I mean by that that I am for the thing that is right, and will do all I can for this ticket, for I agreed to and I meant what I said, and I sincerely hope that the rest of the defeated candidates will do the same. Thanking all that have shown me favors in the past. I want to thank you, too, Mr. Editor, for your kindness through this campaign that has just ended. Respectfully, MOSES A. KILLGORE.

In our opinion, Mr. Killgore exhibits in the above letter a spirit that atones for any mistakes we may think he has made in the past, and the manly way in which he takes defeat and the loyalty he shows to the nominees is an example for some who have decried him in the past. "Go thou and do likewise." EDITOR UNION.

Clanton, Aug. 1, 1904.

Dear Editor—In the last issue of the banner W. Y. Atchison invited the republicans to attend a dem barbecue. Mr. A. is too late. If he had invited us during our last democratic administration several of us might have gone, for any old thing is better than free soup. But we have plenty at home now, thanks to the republican party. Next he said he was going to colonize the republican party. I think if he could awake and see things as intelligent people see them, he would find the republicans colonized already with almost the whole United States for their colony. Let me tell you what I saw on the streets of Clanton a few days ago: I saw a man strutting up the sidewalk on Main street with a rooster badge on, and he overtook some negroes and just walked right in the crowd and shook hands with them and I remarked to a friend that that was the whitest negro I'd seen in Clanton; and my friend says "That's no negro; he's a democratic nominee." Now wouldn't we be proud of a man like that? I think the roosters had best mope off and die, and let the dems have the negroes; they could never get in office without them. Success to THE UNION.

REPUBLICAN.

Prattville, Ala., August 1, 1904.

Editor Union—Allow me space to say a few words from Prattville. Hurrah for L. H. Reynolds and the other nominees. I'm very sorry Mr. W. Y. Atchison from Mulberry, who claimed to be a pop. I think he is a pop yet from the way he popped off. He said he was like the Irishman; he knew them by the tune. If Mr. Atchison ever had any tune the hogs got it and he is left trying to sing something he don't know. I've seen such men as he is before. Them sort of men can live on democrat soup and range beef. But Lord bless your old soul, we pops and republicans would starve to death before dinner. Now, Mr. Editor, I'm no politician, but I've got good horse sense enough to know good from evil, and when I get snake bit once I won't put my hand in its mouth any more; but I don't think that writer would have sense enough to take his hand out. Now, Mr. Editor, the writer talks about "a mouse's ear full of brains." If he has got any at all they must be below his boots, and from the way he writes, his nose must be very flat and needs colonizing with his race. He said if they had called him a republican he would have quit the party. Now I think its better not to have such men with us; we need men with sense and backbone. We don't want knock-kneed, double-tongue, box-ankle, smart Alecks. Well, I'll close, expecting to hear from the "writer" soon.

STANTON.

Our town continues to grow. The Excelsior mill is completed and is turning out as fine excelsior as any place. Crops are looking fine, with plenty of rain. Our new school building is nearing completion and will be ready for the next session, which begins September 6th. Mr. W. C. Dyer made a flying trip to Selma Monday. Miss Lillian Whetstone, of Burnsville, is the guest of Miss Ethel Bacon. Ernest says "make hay while the sun shines" is his motto. Mr. Kemp has resigned his position as clerk at Dyer's and accepted a position at Pratt City. Miss Alice Brown has returned to her home in Birmingham after spending several days with Mrs. W. C. Dyer. Mrs. Gregory has been visiting home folks at Riderville the past week. Rev. I. Windsor will conduct a series of meetings at the Baptist church, beginning the first Sunday, and will be assisted by Bro. Upson. The entertainment given at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Schuster on last Wednesday night was highly enjoyed by all present. Ice cream and cake were served to the satisfaction of all, and all agreed that the time had passed away far too rapidly. Although some of the boys stayed away on account of news they heard that day, or in spite of the girls' will. It was said some boys were coming from Maplesville. Also boys, don't try to spite girls, or else they'll set your head in a whirl. Most of the girls were feeling their best and did what they could to entertain the rest. So the boys that stayed away were not missed in our social play. For Stanton boys and Maplesville gents can't interfere with Stanton girls when on pleasure bent. So to the next entertainment I guarantee the boys will come; now wait and see.

Thorsby, Ala., August 2, 1904.

Editor Union:

Now the people's primary is over and what was a few days ago an event looked forward to with deep interest by many who were aspirants, together with their various friends and supporters, is now a matter of history, and as as evident from the beginning many were destined to disappointment, but of course every sensible, right-thinking man understood that the contest was submitted to the voters to decide who should be their servants and standard bearers, and now the people have signified their choice. We come to the crucial point of test as to every man's sincerity and loyalty to the principles which we profess; for any man can stand when he thinks there is a probability of success for himself, but when he has failed to reach the purpose of his individual desires, then it is that the real test of his manhood reaches the climax, and I am proud of our friends who were candidates in the late primary, for on last Thursday, the day of the final count of the vote by the executive committee, several came long distances (knowing already that they were defeated) to reaffirm their allegiance to the ticket nominated. Such men are of the stuff of which heroes are made and where there are men of such true grit, weaklings, tricksters and schemers will have a mighty poor show, and right here in this connection I wish to say that our enemies will make their supremest effort to get in their most effective dirty work. They will try every defeated candidate by taking them at a time when they are in a state of mind more easily affected and by all manner of falsehoods and pretended sympathy they will endeavor to demoralize and confuse their minds, and we have reason to believe that these parties are now exceedingly busy (like old Satan when he was tempting Christ) working those whom they think are weak enough to fall into the trap, and this is always what you may call the aftermath of primaries. However, we can not think that there is a Judas among us. If so, the spirit of Satan will soon find him and the people will know his number.

I want, by way of conclusion, to thank the people for the hearty support which I received for the office of assessor, for all who supported me did it of their own free will and accord, as I submitted my case entirely to the voters. I held no special promises or agreements with any one, in any way, neither do I believe that any of the other nominees formed any combination or special agreements in any way, for surely I could have learned of such things had they existed, for when such charges were made I did all in my power to find them out; but utterly failed to do so, but invariably traced such things to the camps of the enemy, and now the people are lining up to the ticket, and while some like myself did not get every man of their choice, they say that taken all around we have a splendid ticket and we will do as we have always done, that is to elect it by a big majority, for the more tricks the enemy try the stronger our boys will work and so we will demonstrate that the people will rule.

Yours for the right,
L. B. POUNDS.

Jemison, Ala., August 2, 1904.

Editor Union:

Please let me have a small space in THE UNION to express my gratitude to the people of Chilton county. No one ever received a nomination that was appreciated more than I do this one for probate judge, and especially so overwhelming an indorsement for the highest place in the gift of the people of this county. While some worked hard for other candidates, that was their privilege, and I appreciate any one that has the courage to do as they think right, but this has been a family contest, so now let us train our guns on our enemies. I've made no wounds during this canvass, and have tried to conduct an honorable campaign; in fact, I've done very little to secure the nomination, because I knew the people of Chilton county and that they had opinions of their own and would do as they pleased. Take it as a whole, I've had one of the pleasantest canvasses I've ever witnessed, free from mud slinging or abuse; but if, during the heat of the campaign something has been said or done that was unpleasant, let's forget it and bury it with the primary, and all get up behind the nominees and so elect our ticket with ease. The vote in the primary settled the question of electing the ticket, but let us make the majority as large as we can. Well, I think the people have had enough politics for a while and need a rest, but should any issue arise that needs our attention, I am ready, as your nominee for judge, to meet it and to do all that I can that is honorable to help elect the ticket. Again thanking you from the depths of my heart for the overwhelming indorsement you gave me, and especially the almost unanimous vote I got at home, I hope each voter will take this as a personal expression of my gratitude for their support. I'm glad to see those that have helped us in the past coming back and getting into line with the people; yes, our doors hang wide open and the people stand ready to welcome them, and the past shall be the past. We now join forces to work for the future good of the people and against the "bosses," and we invite all who believe in the rule of the people to join us. Respectfully,

L. H. REYNOLDS.

Thorsby, August 1, 1904.

Editor Union:

Through your paper I want to thank the people of Chilton county for their support in the primary of July 26th, which gave me the nomination for treasurer, and especially I thank my friends in beats 9 and 1 for standing by me. It makes me feel good to have my home people stand by me and it will make my friends that supported me in other parts of the county feel all right. Now that the primary is over I feel that all who voted for others for this office ARE NOW MY FRIENDS and when elected in November I don't think any will have cause for regret in having voted for me. I wish to say that I never found better people anywhere than in our county. Everywhere I went during my canvass myself and horse were well cared for. So now for the crowning victory in November. My best wishes for the people of Chilton and THE UNION.

Respectfully,
J. BICE.

Union, August 8, 1904.

Editor Union:

I want to correct a report which is going the rounds concerning my voting in the democratic primary held April 11, 1904. The report is false as it is base, and base as it is false. I've voted the populist ticket ever since Tom Jones was elected governor. I am a populist because I believe in their principles. Two years ago when the vote was taken to see if we would go into the republican party there were 32 votes cast in beat 1; 31 of them were republican, 1 was populist, and I cast that vote. Hoping this will satisfy all parties concerned, I am in the fight for better times. Success to THE UNION. Yours truly,

J. W. SORRELL.

BARBARIC SPLENDOR.

Tendency Noticed in the Latest Productions of the Jeweler.

Ornaments such as glisten on the bosom of Indian princesses are now chosen for the adornment of Western maidens. Barbaric splendor is the object toward the attainment of which the jeweler applies his art.

Precious stones of the richest and most brilliant colorings are used to fashion corsage ornaments. These consist of silver chains, tarnished as though by age. Here and there they are studded with flowers wrought in silver and fashioned in relief, some of these flowers measuring more than an inch across. Pendant from the chains are glistening stones, pale green, pink, crimson, transparent, blue, faintly tinted with lavender, some very large, indeed, perhaps an inch and a half across. These beautiful pendants are not necessarily formal in shape, though some are cut in ovals, circles and hearts. All have facets, which cause them to shine brilliantly in artificial light.

Of all the precious and semi precious stones used in this way by the art jeweler, perhaps the pale, translucent green of aquamarine is most attractive. It suggests to the mind's eye the cool depths of old ocean.

The gleaming yellow topaz is also very showy set in this way. Without any backing, simply held in place by a silver band, it has a limpid beauty which otherwise one could not appreciate.

The lapis-lazuli is one of the uncommon stones thus employed, and its rich dark blue, opaque and veined with red and white, makes it very popular.

The changeful tints of the opal show to advantage in these ornaments. Other stones are used are jade, green, as jealousy; green, red yellow and white cornelians, amethyst, malachite and emerald matrix and pure white crystal. It is difficult, after all, to say which of these is handsomest, though for delicate coloring the amethyst is conspicuous.

The Dauntless Vierge.

The French papers are full of tributes to the famous illustrator, Daniel Vierge, who died in Paris recently. Jules Claretie tells in the Temps how the strong, vigorous artist, fresh from bear hunting in the Pyrenees, was stricken down by paralysis during the celebration of the eightieth birthday of Victor Hugo. Everybody supposed that the life work of the brilliant illustrator of Hugo and Michelet was done, for his right side was powerless, but with a dauntless courage he taught himself to work with his left hand, over which he had little control, until it become the equal of the right in his best days. After the stroke he could only speak with extreme difficulty, but with the aid of monosyllables, signs and facial expression he contrived to carry on a lively converse with his friends, and to the last he exhibited an irrepressible gayety of spirit. His friends say that he died twice.

The Great Wheat Belt.

Kansas now stands at the head of the wheat raising States, with Minnesota, California, Washington, Nebraska, Texas and Iowa next in order. Even as recently as ten or twelve years ago it was the States east of the Mississippi that grew the most wheat; now it is the States west of it. Oklahoma raises more wheat than Illinois and South Dakota two and a half times as much as Ohio. Strange to say, Minnesota is the only one of the big wheat States that has flour mills.

Editor Union:

Please publish the following state- ment which will explain itself:

Whereas, some one for some cause has been circulating a report in this beat (1), and possibly all over the county, that J. W. Sorrell voted in the democratic primary held April 11, 1904, now we the managers of said election, hereby certify that it is a falsehood from beginning to end. We want the people of Chilton county to know that this is not a democratic lie.

LOCAL AND PERSONAL.

R. A. Day, of Bibb county, and A. N. Hall, of Verbena, were pleasant visitors Friday.

Moses Popwell was a welcome caller Saturday.

J. P. Easterling paid us a pleasant call Saturday.

E. F. Varden and wife were in Clanton Saturday.

Crayton Culp and J. M. Headley were pleasant visitors Tuesday.

Hon. L. H. Reynolds and Sam W. Collins were in Clanton Tuesday.

The first bale of Alabama cotton was bought in Hartford, Geneva coun- ty, last Tuesday and was bought by P. M. Mitchell, of that town, who paid 15 1-8c per pound. It weighed 452 pounds and classed middling.

B. N. Martin and Newt Gentry, of Thorsby, spent Wednesday in Birming- ham.

Tom Collins, a prominent business man of Calera, was in Birmingham on Wednesday.

Sheriff Morgan went to Birmingham Wednesday on official business.

H. A. Wilson, of Lomax, paid his ANNUAL visit to Birmingham Wed- nesday.

T. J. Hubbard was in Clanton Wed- nesday.

On Friday a son of Bill Maddox kill- ed two moccasin snakes, one of which J. T. Cooley brought into town. It was about four feet long and six inches in circumference.

We acknowledge receipt of a pleas- ant letter from J. L. Thomas, of Jem- son, inclosing some subscriptions. Thank you, Brother Thomas. Let all our friends follow his good example.

Mrs. Bennett Easterling died Satur- day at 3 a. m. and was buried at Wal- nut Creek cemetery on Sunday at 11 a. m. A large number of relatives and friends were present. Mrs. Eas- terling had been a consistent member of the Methodist church for years.

J. T. Palmer died at his residence in Clanton Tuesday, aged 78 years, and was buried in Clanton cemetery Wednesday with Masonic honors.

Some would-be wit put a notice on J. E. Evans' store door Thursday night which read "Republican Headquarters, J. E. Evans, Manager." Mr. Evans is one of the few democrats in town that don't wear the party collar, so let our people when they wish to buy some- thing call at the "Headquarters" and patronize Mr. Evans.

Jemison and Prattville baseball clubs have played two games, each winning one. The rain last Thursday prevented the third game at Prattville, but when it does come off it will be for blood, both being good nines 'way above the average country club.

Messrs. P. D. Wilson, W. C. Robin- son and G. O. Foshee left Monday night on a visit to Oklahoma looking after some real estate investments.

Quite a party left Clanton for St. Louis Tuesday evening comprising Mr. and Mrs. W. I. Mullins, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Jones, Mrs. J. Watts Moore and Miss Nell Mullins. Mr. Mullins was equipped for all contingencies, having acquired a good deal of experi- ence on his trip to Dallas a year or two back, and will keep an eye out for hotels on the American plan, as he is blessed with an appetite propor- tioned to the generous man it nour- ishes.

Miss Laura Burnett died at her brother-in-law's home, Mr. James Os- teen, on Sunday, aged 58 years, and was buried at Collins' chapel ceme- tery Monday evening. She was a member of Union Baptist church.

Miss Selma Fors died in Birming- ham Saturday. Her body was brought to Thorsby and interred there on Mon- day.

MARRIAGE LICENSES.

William G. Glass and Miss Ethel Garner. Norman R. Cost and Miss Susie Blow.

COLORED.

John Coburn and Mary Sullens.

MARS HILL.

We are having plenty of rain and watermelons. We also had a game of ball on Scotland ball ground Saturday between the married men and the bachelors, and it seemed like the youngsters were going to have it all their way till about the fourth inning, and then the daddies showed them yEvL6....E0-5pouliqaatRthatis.e fr fr what they were made of. Some rela- tives of Mr. E. G. Cofer are visiting him, so Sunday evening his sons and daughters, sons-in-law and daughters- in-law and grandchildren all gathered in at his home and what a good time they did have eating watermelons and peaches.

A BALL PLAYER.

PEOPLE'S PARTY COMMITTEE.

The people's party executive com- mittee of Chilton county met in Clan- ton Thursday and made the official count of the votes cast in the primary of the 26th of July. The total vote cast was 965, and the nominees are at the head of our editorial column where they will stay until we elect them in November. After the count was made the nominees and the un- successful candidates (with a few ex- ceptions) and the many members of the party present formed themselves into a convention, or you might call it a ratification meeting, in which such of the unsuccessful candidates as were present said that the "people's choice was their choice," and that they would carry out the promises they made be- fore the primary was held, and would support the nominees. M. A. Kilgore being very explicit in his talk and thus setting a good example. The following resolution was passed unani- mously:

"Resolved, 1. That we and each of us present consider ourselves a spe- cial committee to work from now un- til November 8th for the ticket nomi- nated on July 26th. 2. That we in- vite every populist and republican who is not present to join us in this reso- lution. 3. That a copy of this resolu- tion be handed to THE UNION for publication."

The members of the executive com- mittee are T. J. Dorminy, D. P. Mar- tin, beat 1; W. H. Shaw, C. L. Lang- ston, beat 2; R. J. Williams, F. J. Fitts, beat 3; J. M. Littlejohn, Sr., J. D. COOPER.

Editor Union:

I want to congratulate the people of Chilton for their manly courage on July 26th. It shows the dems that the people are going to RULE this county in spite of the LIES of a ring at Clanton with a few boot licks in each beat. You know they resorted to every device from hiring Jennings up, but the people can't be fooled nor duped by such a set. The people have nominated as strong a ticket as has ever been put before the voters, re- gardless of politics, and we're just as sure to elect it as the 8th of Novem- ber comes. I notice a piece in the banner signed A. J. Penton (better known as Evangelist Penton). He says it makes his eyes sore when he looks at proceedings of the republican convention. I want to tell Penton he'll be as blind as a railroad engine before such rot as he writes will change any vote in Chilton. A. J., let me ask you a few questions and you answer them from an unprejudiced standpoint. What party was it that caused secession? What party was it that gave the negro the right to vote in Alabama? Who was it that waltzed with Fred Douglas at the white house ball? What party put negroes on the jury in Dallas county in the past year? Answer these satisfactorily and I'll give you some more. Now in re- ply to that mullet head out at Mul- berry, will say that anybody but a fool knows that letter that Reynolds wrote sealed Mims's mouth as tight as water cement; in fact, I'm sure its daddy lived in Clanton up to July 26th, but he has taken his flight to parts un- known. So, boys, do like you have been doing, eat barbecue meat, loaf bread and vote people's party ticket, and if you haven't taught them some- thing, they are bigger fools than I thought they were. Mulberry says six big black flaat-nosed niggers. I want to say to you, Mulberry, that some of them negroes (like most all negroes in democratic stronghoids) have got lots of Caucasian blood in them, and from an educational standpoint they have forgotten more than you will ever know. Also from their financial standing they could buy you and not size their pile. So you see they know something and have got a little. In conclusion I'll say that you nor your party can't fool any one, and you'll have to get up another issue besides the negro.

OAK GROVE.

A few lines concerning our school at Oak Grove. We have had a very successful school and have got a third grade teacher and we think that we'll have to exclude 25 graduates by the time school expires. Among this list are Messrs. George Driver, Monroe Trawick and Walter Taylor; Misses Ina Elland, Belle Dennis and Lena Headley. I'd give you a list of all the names, but it would take too much space in your valuable paper. So look out for more and better schools in Alabama. Wishing success to THE UNION and its many readers,

The Queen of Queens.

States rise and fall; the sceptered kings
  Arrayed in royal robes to-day
Must pass with other earthly things.
  Their fame shall fade, their thrones decay,
But one proud queen will always reign
  And claim allegiance everywhere;
Her realm is all of man's domain.
  Her throne the peaceful rocking chair.

Her prince's head lies on her breast.
  Her crown is joy, her scepter love;
She reigns by right divine, expressed
  Directly to her from above.
Though kings must pass, though nations wane,
  The glad young mother, proud and fair,
While men are men shall sweetly reign,
  Enthroned upon the rocking chair.

THE PISTOL SHOT

BY MRS. WADE HAMPTON, JR.

Copyright, 1901, by Daily Story Publishing Company.

"Dear Tom:—I might begin my letter just as that other girl did in that poem we read together. Do you remembers?

"'I am sitting alone by the fire, dressed as I came from the dance, in a robe even you would admire, for it cost a cool thousand in France; I'm bediamoned out of all season; my hair is done up in a cue; in short, sir, "the belle of the season" is wasting an hour on you.'

"It's really true, Tom, I'm called the 'belle of the season.' I might as well have a bell around my neck, for as soon as I appear anywhere there is a clatter of tongues and I hear audibly enough, 'Oh, that's the rich Miss Ethel Westover!' Every word sounds to my tired ears like the dropping of dollars and cents on a silver church plate. Go where you will, one can't get away from that idea of money. 'In God we trust' is all very well, but it is written on a dime.

"Sometimes when I am sitting by myself—it is not often, dear—I try to dream the long hours away with happy thoughts of you, and then I think I hear Black Bess galloping under my window, and I actually run to see if you will not pull rein at the gate and stop.

"Oh, how I do miss the oaks and flowers and the blue mountains! How glad I shall be to get back to the hills and the stars—and you!"

In a small town on the outskirts of California was set a square frame house with its four quarters over a long range of mountains. The house had the distinction of being the home of Tom Ellsworth, the well known fiance of the richest heiress in all the country round. Tom was anything but rich, but he had "prospects" and consequently was regarded as the most important of all the ranchmen and miners in that region. He was a big, handsome, athletic fellow—the son of a gentleman who had gone from Massachusetts out to California for his health, but almost as soon lost the money he had, and when he died left Tom, his only son and heir, a legacy of numerous debts.

Tom had loved Ethel Westover ever since they had walked hand in hand to the one public school together. Ethel's father was a miner, but one day "he struck it rich," and then came the usual revolution. The mother had but one thought—of Ethel, then a girl of sixteen. When the fortune came she was borne away to a fashionable boarding school in New York amidst tears and promises to Tom. Then came Paris and London. In that time the rumor drifted to the little town of "Rocky Mountain" that Mrs. Westover was trying to forget all associations with her past. But there was Tom! And Tom would not "Alone by the fire."

"down" and Ethel would not forget.

Tom was now twenty-five and his debts were paid. He had seen Ethel but once in three years. She had grown so tall and was so beautiful that he felt a little afraid of her. But she had thrown her soft arms around his neck and clung to him just as in the old days.

"I shall always love you, Tom—always. Oh, Tom, don't let them take me from you!"

"No, darling!" and he had kept the brown head to his breast and let his lips meet again and again the little mouth that had said such loving words to him.

He had meant it—no one should take her from him—no one in all the wide, wide world! He vowed it silently to every living creature, and, God help him, he would keep it!

Her last letter lay open before him

Here would be vengeance

now. It said she was coming back—and then—and then? His heart beat until he could hear it as he looked at the lovely oval face and the large, tender eyes of the picture he had carried for so long, and his eyes devoured hungrily every curve of the sweet face.

"You must be true—you must be true!" he cried, almost with a sob. "And yet, heart of my heart, will you be happy? What have I to offer you? Only love,—love,—but a wealth of it that all the mines of hidden treasures could not buy one golden throb of!"

"He ain't the same lookin' Tom."

"Goes pretty hard with him, eh?"

"Bein's as it should as he's—"

"Hush, boys, here he comes!"

Tom shook hands with each one. His pale, drawn face hurt the heart of every rough man present. They started in to tell their woes and trials in "rounding up the cattle." It was the principal event in their hard lives. The losses and hardships seemed as hard as any man could endure. They wanted him to know that other men suffered, too, and bore it like men.

The whole town was talking about it. Tom knew this but he did not avoid the town. He had been fighting the hardest battle of his life for three days. When he had seen it blazoned in all the papers he turned white and sick and cold. He had refused to believe it, and ground his teeth over the "yellow journals." He sent a telegram. Then he laid the yellow paper the answer was written on into the blazing fire and watched it curl and burn into ashes.

He was alone now. He unfolded the papers and read the notice again. The lamp-light seemed to make the letters blacker.

"Married—At the Church of All Saints, Ethel Westover to James, Duke of Stromcourt."

Tom laid the papers, just as he had done the telegram, into the fire. He unlocked a drawer and took from it a bundle of letters. One by one they joined the holocaust of love and memory. He took the picture with its lovely eyes and tender mouth and for one moment he waked to the awful truth.

"She has been sold—sold!" he cried. "And she begged me not to let them take her from me!"

He turned his suffering face to the glint of steel in the open drawer. It fascinated him like an evil eye. He drew it slowly towards him and looked deep into the deadly hollow. Here would be vengeance. He had stolen her—that "silly little Duke!"

But why had she not resisted? If she had loved him as he had loved her no power could have taken her from him. Bah! She was not worth it!

He put the pistol down and shook from head to foot. And yet—faithless or not, he could not live without her! And once more he took up the pistol and passed hindkerchief up and down its shining length and drew the crooked thumbpiece to see if all was right. He could even see the stars shining through as he put his eye to the empty space and looked clear into the face of heaven.

He remembered her last words—"I shall be so glad to get back to the hills and the stars—and you!"

He was going to the stars himself. He would tell them how false she had been to them and to him. He panted as if smothered, and raised the window. The cold breath on his face seemed to revive him. He could see the white and glittering like snow under the starlight, and far beyond the dim outline of the ghostly mountains. And all around him were the homes of the stout-hearted miners and ranchmen. He looked once more down the still throat of the pistol, and then over to the hills.

The reports rang clear and sharp—one-two-three-four. The doors of every house in town were flung wide and the men, waving the women back, rushed to the house where a bright light seramed through an open window.

"I thought 'twould come," said one.

"I feel shamed in my innards for such a man," said a big fellow with but one arm. "He ain't half a man——"

"He ain't no man at all by this time," said another. And they stumbled up the stairs into Ellsworth's room.

They stopped with their eyes open.

"It's all right, fellows." Tom spoke huskily, but there was a new light in his eyes. "I meant to, but she isn't worth it." He threw the emptied pistol from him. "I thought it was the best way to let you know. I shot straight up to the stars. In future I'll try to be all that you've thought about me. That's it. I couldn't bear to lose your respect."

He waited at the open window until he heard the last footstep pass out.

A thin voice came up to him through the mist of the night. "No, there ain't no woman wuth that!"

DOES WASHING ON BICYCLE.

Virginia Man's Device Makes the Day One of Pleasure.

H. G. Hitner has been exercising his inventive genius, and the result of his efforts is that the weekly family wash day, instead of being a burden, as it is to most people, is the day he enjoys most of any of the six whereon man is permitted to labor. He is the owner of a rotary washing machine which he geared to his bicycle after the latter had been suspended in a frame. After the clothing has been placed in the machine, with the usual supply of water and soap, Harry lights a cigar, mounts his bicycle and wheels away. By the time he has pedaled enough to take him to New Market if the wheels were on the ground, the clothing has been washed, he has had an enjoyable ride, and he and his good wife are correspondingly happy. This is only one of the many new things that have been inaugurated in Edinburg during the last few months, and it helps to prove what every one says about us—viz.: "The old town is surely on a boom."

P. S.—Since last week the weather has gotten too hot for Harry to pedal, so he has attached County Treasurer Hutcheson's motorcycle to the machine, and he now swings in the hammock and basks in the early morning sunshine while the motor-cycle does the washing.—Edinburg (Va.) Sentinel.

Song of Hope.

Children of yesterday,
  Heirs of to-morrow,
What are you weaving?
  Labor and sorrow?
Look to your looms again.
  Faster and faster
Fly the great shuttles
  Prepared by the Master,
Life's in the loom,
  Room for it—
  Room!

Children of yesterday,
  Heirs of to-morrow,
Lighten the labor
  And sweeten the sorrow.
Now, while the shuttles fly
  Faster and faster,
Up, and be at it,
  At work with the Master;
He stands at your loom,
  Room for Him—
  Room!

Children of yesterday,
  Heirs of to-morrow,
Look at your fabric.
  Of labor and sorrow.
Seamy and dark
  With despair and disaster,
Turn it, and—lo,
  The design of the Master!
The Lord's at the loom;
  Room for Him—
  Room!

Allison Tells of Changes.

Imagine Senator Allison, many years chairman of the influential committee on appropriations, in a long struggle to secure the appointment of a skilled laborer to help him in his duties around the capitol! Then you have a picture of the astute Iowan as he described himself recently to his colleagues.

During debate regarding the extension of the capitol building Mr. Allison became reminiscent about the growth in the amount of public business that senators must attend to. He said that when he first came to the senate, thirty years ago, senators had no clerks or others to help them.

"Several years passed," said Mr. Allison gravely, "and still I had no assistant. Finally I succeeded in securing the appointment of a man as a skilled laborer, who helped me in my clerical work."

A smile went round the senate chamber at this description, for nowadays every senator has at least a clerk and a messenger.—Boston Post.

HER CARDS ALL RIGHT.

Of Course Postmaster Read Them, but She Did Not Care.

"This craze for souvenir post cards is the funniest fad that has struck people for a long time, I think; don't you?" inquired a Brooklyn girl of her friend from New Jersey, pausing in front of a large stationery store on Broadway.

"Why, are you receiving them, too?" asked the young girl. "I have had about two dozen of them sent to me in the last ten days, and some of them are pretty enough to mount."

"Oh, my," sighed Miss Brooklyn, "the ones I get are all battered up, and the picture mined by the 'received' mark. I don't see how you can mount them in that condition—or, have you found a way to take off the stamps?"

"I'm not bothered that way," rejoined Miss Jersey. 'Mine are never defaced; our postmaster always stamps them on the 'address only' side. I suppose he reads them, too, but there is never very much on them, so I don't care. You see, our town is so small that he has plenty of time to turn the cards over and stamp them on the wrong side. Of course you couldn't expect it in a large place like Brooklyn."—New York Times.

NAME NOT LIVED UP TO.

Petropavlovsk's Fate Brings Compassion to Senator Hale's Mind.

Senator Hale claims that the fate of the Petropavlovsk proves that battleships are obsolete.

"The word battleship," he said the other day, "is now a misnomer. This big and costly and helpless sea monster, that at a touch of a $4 mine or torpedo turns turtle and sinks—what right has it to call itself a battleship any longer?

"Hardly any more right," the Senator went on, "than the child of a certain Ellsworth couple had to call itself Methuselah. The parents of this child liked Biblical names, and their children, as they appeared, were christened Noah, Ruth, Shem, and so on. Finally a boy baby arrived, and the name of Methuselah was bestowed on him.

"But poor little Methuselah did not live up to his name. On the contrary he died—died in his infancy—and in one of our Ellsworth cemeteries you may see his tomb, with the epitaph:

"Methuselah Carney, aged nine months.

"I think of the epitaph," concluded Senator Hale, "whenever I think of modern battleships."

Origin of a Marriage Custom.

"Casting a shoe after a newly married couple is one of the oldest customs that still clings to the fabric of this up-to-date life," Mr. John Clinton told me recently. "Centuries ago, nay, thousands of years ago, it was one of the means employed by the people of antiquity to indicate ownership.

"When a piece of land was purchased or given to one, or a man acquired ownership of a house, a cow, or took unto himself a wife, it was the established custom to cast a shoe over the land, the building, the animal or the woman, thus asserting to the world that he had acquired all rights of ownership. The custom is mentioned in several places in the Bible, but the only instance I can specifically recall to mind just now is in Psalms ix., 8, where the phrase, 'Over Edom will I cast out my shoe,' is employed to mean that by this method will ownership be asserted. Few who do it probably know why they cast a shoe after the newly-married, but in this ancient custom is its origin found. So does a relic of barbarism linger in our midst, and for her own sake the bride ought to see to it that it is no longer practiced."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Perseverance.

Press on! 'Tis not in deeds, but in their constant doing,
The soul of man grows rich in truth, in love, and trust.
He who through all his work some word
  of praise is wooing,
Shall find his fruits at last will turn to bitter dust.

For 'tis the voice within gives man his sweetest pleasure,
Friends praise too well, and foes are never just or kind.
One's conscience—this must be sole arbiter and measure;
And, though conceit may flatter, 'tis the truth must bind.

Press on! Herein alone success is sure and smiling.
In this alone each lowly man shall reach life's goal,
And on the way, while deathless hope is pain beguiling,
Shall joy ring music in each dark and lonely soul!

—Charles W. Stevenson, in Boston Budget.

Tact Behind the Counter.

"Talk about being a good saleswoman," said a clerk in one of the big stores. "Mrs. X. came in this morning to buy a rain cloak, and what do you think I sold her?"

"Can't guess."

"A pink chiffon party dress and a lace parasol."

"Well, I didn't do so badly myself," said another. "We had a lot of maids' caps, made of Swiss and lace, and I sold about ten for pincushion covers."

"That's as bad as my brother in the drug store. A man came in with a headache and wanted to buy a menthol pencil to rub on his forehead. They were out of menthol pencils and George sold him a stick of indellible ink."—Indianapolis News.

Mail Service in Game of Bridge.

An innovation in the game of bridge is to play it by mail. Partners in different cities having been arranged, the four select an umpire, who deals four hands and mails one to each. The game then proceeds in the usual way, each player communicating his play to the others through the umpire. It is not necessary that the players should be aware of each other's identity until the contest has been ended.

An Eden in Africa

The secretary of the Uganda protectorate, Mr. Cunningham, who has just arrived from Uganda, has given a representative of Reuster's agency the following interesting particulars concerning the present condition of the protectorate:

"The latest news that I give you of Uganda," said Mr. Cunningham, "is that there has been an extraordinary development of tourist traffic on the Uganda railway. When I was at Mombassa it had been found necessary to duplicate all the trains from the coast to Lake Victoria in order to carry tourists and intending settlers. I should say 10,000 was a small estimate of the number of tourists to be looked for during the coming season.

"The scenery is unique and there is about fifty miles of zoological gardens, teeming with wild animals. On my way down country at the Kapiti plains we passed through a herd of fully 50,000 zebras; we saw twenty ostriches, some rhinoceroses and giraffes in the distance and the plains simply swarmed with gazelles. The zebras, whose stripes shone in the bright sun, were massed on the railway line and merely divided to let the train pass, a few scampering away for one Lundred yards or so. Nowhere else in the world can such a sight be witnessed.

"And then to many people the natives are still more interesting than the wild animals or the scenery. Here in London you have the twentieth century, but in Kavirondo it is [illegible] day after the creation, with the evidence that the Adams and Eves of Kavirondo have not yet discovered that they are naked, and instead of living in beatific leisure among the trees Adam and Eve may be seen ing gardens along the railway carrying baskets of grain to the [illegible] at Port Florence, the majority of [illegible] without an atom of clothing. [illegible] there is nothing to affect the [illegible] bilities of the European visitor. [illegible] nature. You might as well object [illegible] sycamore tree going without [illegible] object to a Kavirondo man or [illegible] going naked. At the railway [illegible] alas! they are gradually getting [illegible] into trousers; but, as a rule Eve [illegible] moves in all her native charms [illegible] ing at most a tassel suspended [illegible] a girdle.

"The cruise around Lake [illegible] occupies about a week, the [illegible] touching at all the German and [illegible] ish stations. The scenery at Entebbe and Munyonyo (the port of Kampala) is very fine, and, as the coast [illegible] among the most beautiful parts of [illegible] Sose archipelago and the Bugala group, there is an unending feast for the eye of pretty creeks, bold headlands and banks of graceful palms, broad slopes of turf. [illegible] the Ripon falls, they defy description. I think it may safely be said that a tour to Uganda outrivals in interest anything to be found elsewhere in the world."—London News.

"Chink" Pet of Whites

"Did you ever see a one-armed or one-legged Chinaman?" asked George W. Otterson, the hydraulic engineer yesterday. Of course, you never did. They are rare. I have lived in California, in the Hawaiian Islands, and in China, in all of which places there are some Chinese, but I never saw a crippled Mongolian until I went to Quesnelle, B. C., last winter.

"There one of the chief characters of the town is a one-armed and one-legged Chinaman, the pet of the town. He is the Quesnelle city waterworks. Being without a pipe line of any character, the people of Quesnelle have to draw their water by bucket from the Fraser river. This old Chinaman has built up a substantial trade drawing and carrying water for them. His regular customers number the inhabitants of nearly every house in town.

"There is a quaint little story in his being there. As all who have lived among the Chinese know, they object strenuously to a crippled member of their race being allowed to live. It is said they invariably [illegible] away with a cripple, on the [illegible] that he is taking the place [illegible] world of a better Chinaman. [illegible] old fellow at Quesnelle was [illegible] in a mine some years ago, [illegible] was blown up in an explosion [illegible] dynamite. One leg and one arm [illegible] so badly mangled that they were [illegible] putated. Knowing the peculiarities [illegible] the Chinese, and liking the old [illegible] low, the whites of the town [illegible] notice on the Chinese colony [illegible] if the man was molested in the [illegible] est there would be a general rising [illegible] out of all the Chinese in the [illegible] Then the whites took the man [illegible] their protection and started him [illegible] the water business. He seems [illegible] to go near his own people, and [illegible] sorts entirely with the whites.

Work of Sixty Years

The Electrical World and Engineer, in an article on "Sixty Years of the Telegraph," says: "The past week has witnessed the sixtieth anniversary of the electromagnetic telegraph, it being May 1, 1844, when Prof. Morse was able to demonstrate the use of his invention in reporting at Washington the proceedings of the Whig convention at Baltimore. Since that time the history of the telegraph in this country and elsewhere has been one of universal benefit. It is certainly a moot question whether of late years the telegraph has advanced as rapidly as it might have done, and whether it has not become more or less crystalized and fossilized in its apparatus and methods. Yet even this statement must be made guardedly, for, while the great telegraph systems the world over appear to look askance on automatic and machine methods, the wireless telegraph inventions have been generally taken up and pushed with great success; and if there is anything more wonderful and more stimulating in the domain of electrical advance at the present time than the wireless [illegible] do not know what it is. The [illegible] of service rendered to the public [illegible] the telegraph sixty years ago [illegible] practical inception may be [illegible] from the fact that in only four [illegible] of the leading countries 400,000,000 [illegible] 500,000,000 authentic messages are [illegible] patched annually, exclusive of [illegible] handled by leased private wires. [illegible] this country the record is now [illegible] ably about 100,000,000 a year. [illegible] Great Britain does not fall [illegible] behind that. Germany and [illegible] together are good for another 100,000,000, while Russia, Italy, Austria, [illegible] Spain will probably account for [illegible] other batch of equal magnitude. [illegible] telephone to-day has asserted for [illegible] the function of knitting closer together the various communities [illegible] which it is used, but it is no [illegible] proud boast of the telegraph and [illegible] submarine cable that they have [illegible] the great instrumentality in [illegible] lating distance, promoting intercourse and commerce and bringing nations together."

The Soul's One Hour

All day I have toiled in that busy mill
  Where souls are ground and money is made;
All day, till my temples throb and thrill
  With the whirring grind of the wheels of trade.

All day I have gripped the trenchant steel
  And grappled with columns black and grim;
Till to-night I am faint and my senses reel,
  And the glory of God seems far and dim.

And so I have come to this quiet room
  To sit in the dark and touch the keys—
To wake the ghost and the lost perfume
  Of the soul's dead flowers with my harmonies.

And here, alone, for a single hour
  I can dream and idle and drift away;
I can touch the ghost of a passion-flower—
  I can catch the gleam of a vanished day.
I can gather the lilies of long ago
  That bloomed by the path where I trod;
And love's first roses, as white as snow
  That are blossoming now at the throne of God.

Oh, stainless lilies, and roses red!
  Oh, passion-flower, with your scent of gold!
You are mine once more for an hour to-night,
  Tho' the heart be dumb and the lips be dead.

Oh, scented summer of long ago
  Oh, vanished day with your sun of gold!
Oh, blood-red lips and bosom of snow
  You are mine once more as in days of old.

Just for to-night, for at early dawn
  I am back to the grovel of grime and gain,
Where the wheels of traffic go whirling on.
  And souls are ground into gold and pain.

—Albert Bigelow Paine in Ladies' Home Journal.

A Plausible Excuse.

Russell Sage was talking the other day about a dishonest but plausible broker.

"I have caught this man," he said, "in a dozen shady transactions. He has always, though, been ready to excuse himself."

Mr. Sage smiled. Then he resumed: "He reminds me of a chap who broke a plate glass window [illegible] As soon as he had broken the [illegible] he hurried off as fast as he [illegible] But the shopkeeper had seen him [illegible] shopkeeper came after him and [illegible] bed him by the collar.

WIT AND HUMOR

A TROUBLESOME BOY.

Two modern fathers once were deep
Comparing notes on sons,
The worry they had caused their sires
With horses, boats and guns;
They each retailed the money which
Their escapades had lost them,
And sighed to think of sleepless nights
Those thankless lads had cost them.

Just then Dame Venus happened to
Be passing and to hear;
"Ah, friends," she said, "you do not know
Whereof you speak, I fear;
I have a son who shoots no guns,
But just a bow and arrow,
And yet the damages I've had
To pay would freeze your marrow!"
—William Wallace Whitelock, in The Criterion.

SUPERIOR STRATEGY.

She—So you think that men are smarter than women, do you?
He—Some men, but not all.
She—Well, what men are smarter?
He—Old bachelors. —Illustrated Bits.

ON THE JUMP.

"That fellow is a most remarkable runner."
"Who? Burroughs?"
"Yes. He's always running in debt and yet he's forever running away from the people to whom he is in debt."—Philadelphia Press.

HE KNEW THE ANSWER.

Teacher—Now, Tommy, if you had twelve plums and your little brother asked you for one-half of them, how many would you have left?
Tommy (promptly) — Twelve! — Philadelphia Public Ledger.

EASY TO SEE THAT.

"Will you direct me to Farmer Skinner's house" asked the newly arrived summer boarder.
"I will if ye want me to," replied the station lounger.
"I shall have to ask you for explicit directions because I've never been there before."
"Gosh! I know that, seein' ye're determined to go there now."—Philadelphia Press.

REMOTE AND SAFE.

Brown—Gracious, Jones is slow.
Smith— Yes, he'd be a good fellow to send to the North Pole.
Brown—I don't see the connection.
Smith—Why, as long as anybody was left to ask him questions about his plans, he'd never get out of town. —Cincinnati Commercial Tribune.

JUST HIS IMAGINATION.

"Julia," her father called from the head of the stairs.
"Yes, father."
"Did I hear a smack down there just now."
"If you did you're a wonder. I've been listening for one all evening, but without results." — Chicago Record-Herald.

WOULDN'T BELIEVE IT.

"Bliggins is a good fellw, but he lacks tact."
"What has he been doing now?"
"Trying to tell a Russian to whom I introduced him that old story about the Japanese being the politest people on earth."—Washington Star.

TOO IMPETUOUS.

"Ah!" he cried, "now that we're engaged, let me press you to my heart in——"
"Dont lose yourself,' said the summer girl, pushing him away, "this is no pressing engagement."—Philadelphia Press.

JUVENILE HAPPINESS.

"Did you boys have a good time at your bonfire, Johnny?"
"You bet we did. We burnt a backyard fence, half a dozen piano boxes, an' the most of old Squilligan's smokehouse, an' had a be-yootiful run when the police got after us."—Chicago Tribune.

THE VERY LATEST.

"Have you heard about the latest insurance company?
"No, what is it?"
"Why, it's one that promises to pay alimony to both parties in case the marriage proves a failure."—Detroit Free Press.

INSUFFICIENT CAUSE.

"There, mamma, I don't believe that your friend, Mrs. Newly, was to the manner born."
"Hush, dear. She's worth three millions in her own right."
"That's hardly enough to justify a woman in trying to eat soft boiled eggs with a fork." — Detroit Free Press.

CHANGED CONDITIONS.

"I'll bet you don't hold your wife on your knee as much now as when you were first married," sneered the old bachelor.
"Well," replied the man who had been paying the freight bills for nearly a year, "to tell the honest truth, she sits on me rather more now than she did then."—Chicago News.

EARLY EXPRESS SERVICE.

Wells-Fargo Company and the Development of the West.

Thomas Sherman says that in eighty years California went through the same progressive changes that in England required 1000 years to accomplish, says London Success. The history of the last half of these eventful years of the Pacific coast would in no small part be the history of the great Wells-Fargo Express Company. After its establishment in 1852 the company rapidly absorbed all other lines of the State, and was the banker, mail carrier and errand runner for every city, camp or cabin in California.

Henry Wells and William G. Fargo were veterans of the express service before we find their names coupled in that union as closely identified with the West as are the quartz and granite of her hills. Wells was Harnden's agent in Albany in the first branch establishment there, and in 1834 he, with others, planted the first express office of the "West." This was at Buffalo—an outpost then four days and three nights from New York, almost as far as California is to-day. Fargo was express messenger for Wells on this Buffalo line. In 1845 Wells, ever lured toward the West, ever tracking the frontier, pushed out his express to St. Louis, Chicago and Cincinnati. On account of his fine tact and iron resolution Fargo was chosen as manager of this unique and adventurous enterprise. Here in this unjostled space, with his convoy of boats and wagons, he won a large experience in his work.

Wells, ever fertile in ideas and quick to give them shape, now set on foot a letter express at one-fourth the price charged by the Government—six cents instead of twenty-five. Immediately the Government was hot upon his track. He was haled into court again and again, but was always victorious. Then the audacious expressman proposed to the Assistant Postmaster to take charge of the entire mail service of the United States.

"Zounds, sir!" cried the zealous postmaster, his ear to the ground, "such a proceeding would throw 16,000 postmasters out of office. It would never do."

Wells' request was declined by the wary officer, but his protest against high postage went on sounding through the nation, and the next Congress, by the leverage of public opinion, was forced to divide the Government rate by four. So to Henry Wells, leading the host of reform, we owe one of the great forward steps in our civilization.

Kit Carson's Rifle.

It is perhaps not known to all the world that the rifle of Kit Karson, the great Western hunter, scout and explorer, is carefully preserved and may be seen by those who know its whereabouts. At the time of Kit Carson's death he left this rifle to Montezuma Lodge, F. & A. M., of Santa Fe, N. M., in whose charge it has remained ever since, an object of great interest and very highly prized by all members of that society.

Montezuma Lodge is one of the oldest organizations of that nature west of the Missouri River. It was organized as long ago as 1840, at which time the ancient town of Santa Fe was just beginning to take in part the color of the western bound Anglo-Saxon civilization. Fremont's first trip to the Rocky Mountains was made in 1842. There were few white men in all that part of the West at the time of the founding of Montezuma Lodge, but Kit Carson was one of these early members. To his brothers of the society he left what may have been one of his most cherished possessions.—Field and Stream.

The venom of the cobra contains an ingredient not well known that acts upon the nerves. Its effects are rapid and difficult to counteract. This ingredient exists in the cobra's venom to a greater extent than the other substances that make up the poison. The poison of the viperine and crotaline snakes (the rattle snakes, copperhead, moccasin, etc.) contains but a small percentage of this nerve-destroying (or paralyzing) element. The poison of these snakes acts principally upon the blood and in consequence its action is slower.—St. Nicholas.

The rails of the Mexican Gulf railway are laid on mahogany sleepers and the bridges built of white marble. In west Mexico is a line built with ebony sleepers and ballast of silver ore drawn from old mines beside the track. The engineers used these materials because they were the cheapest to be had.

The African Review says that in the Transvaal and the Orange river colony, if the present rate of intermarriage between Briton and Boers is kept up, within twenty years the two races will be so welded together as to be indistinguishable.

The life of an eyelash is from 100 to 150 days. It grows very slowly, but finger nails grow quite rapidly in comparison. If a person could live without breaking his nails for a lifetime they would attain the length of 73 inches.

Giraffes' eyes are so placed that they can see behind them at the same time they can in front.

Mrs. Anderson, a prominent society woman of Jacksonville, Fla., daughter of Recorder of Deeds, West, who witnessed her signature to the following letter, praises Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—There are but few wives and mothers who have not at times endured agonies and such pain as only women know. I wish such women knew the value of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. It is a remarkable medicine, different in action from any I ever knew and thoroughly reliable.

"I have seen cases where women doctored for years without permanent benefit, who were cured in less than three months after taking your Vegetable Compound, while others who were chronic and incurable came out cured, happy, and in perfect health after a thorough treatment with this medicine. I have never used it myself without gaining great benefit. A few doses restores my strength and appetite, and tones up the entire system. Your medicine has been tried and found true, hence I fully endorse it."—MRS. R. A. ANDERSON, 225 Washington St., Jacksonville, Fla.

Mrs. Reed, 2425 E. Cumberland St., Philadelphia, Pa., says:

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I feel it my duty to write and tell you the good I have received from Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"I have been a great sufferer with female trouble, trying different doctors and medicines with no benefit. Two years ago I went under an operation, and it left me in a very weak condition. I had stomach trouble, backache, headache, palpitation of the heart, and was very nervous; in fact, I ached all over. I find yours is the only medicine that reaches such troubles, and would cheerfully recommend Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to all suffering women."

When women are troubled with irregular or painful menstruation, weakness, leucorrhœa, displacement or ulceration of the womb, that bearing-down feeling, inflammation of the ovaries, backache, flatulence, general debility, indigestion, and nervous prostration, they should remember there is one tried and true remedy. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound at once removes such troubles.

The experience and testimony of some of the most noted women of America go to prove, beyond a question, that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound will correct all such trouble at once by removing the cause and restoring the organs to a healthy and normal condition. If in doubt, write Mrs. Pinkham at Lynn, Mass, as thousands do. Her advice is free and helpful.

No other medicine for women in the world has received such widespread and unqualified endorsement. No other medicine has such a record of cures of female troubles. Refuse to buy any substitute.

$5000 FORFEIT if we cannot forthwith produce the original letters and signatures of above testimonials, which will prove their absolute genuineness.
Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., Lynn, Mass.

An authoritative list of the surviving generals of the southern confederacy is furnished by General Marcus J. Wright, a confederate veteran employed by the war department. All the full rank generals had died in 1893 when Beauregard had passed away. There are now four surviving lieutenant generals—Simon B. Buckner, Stephen D. Lee, Alexander F. Stewart and Joseph Wheeler. Of major generals there are eleven, and of the brigadier generals fifty-one. The surviving staff officers of the confederacy shrunk one-half in number during the past decade, and their disappearance now has become very rapid.

One of the most highly prized relics in the British museum is the crown formerly used by the Irish kings in the cornation exercises which made them monarchs of the Emerald Isle. Strictly speaking, there were two of these Irish crowns, the one in question being that used by the MacMurroughs, a family who were anciently kings of Leinston. This regal relic, all that remains of the old Irish monarchy, is a plain gold band, rising to a kind of peak or point in front. It dates back to the middle of the tenth century.

William II., as emperor, does not receive a single groschen from the imperial exchequer and has to keep up his imperial state out of his income as King of Prussia, which in the year after his accession, was raised by $625,000—his civil list, as king, being now over $3,750,000.

In 1896 the total democratic campaign fund was less than $500,000. The fund this year will be in excess of $5,000,000. The McKinley campaign fund raised by Hanna in 1896 amounted to nearly $15,000,000.

DR. WOOLLEY'S
OPIUM AND WHISKY ANTIDOTE
Will cure permanently at your own home.

Mr. T. M. Brown, of DeQueen, Ark., says: "Over seven years ago I was cured of the opium habit by your medicine, and have continued in the very best of health since."

Mr. W. M. Tunstall, of Lovingston, Va., says: "I am glad to say that I firmly believe that I am entirely and permanently cured of the Drink Habit, as I have never even so much as wanted a drink in any form since I took your eradicator, now 18 months ago. It was the best money I ever invested."

Mrs. Virginia Townsend, of Shreveport, La., writes: "No more opium. I have taken no other remedy than yours, and I make no mistake when I say that my health is better now than it ever was in my life, and I owe it to you and your remedy. It has been twelve years since I was cured by your treatment."

Dr. Woolley has thousands of such testimonials, with permission to use them. A treatment with so many recommendations from Physicians and cured patients must be good.

Dr. Woolley's Antidote has imitators, (as all good articles have)—perhaps you have tried some of them, but there is nothing like Woolley's. It has stood the test of thirty years. No man or woman who uses opium or whisky in any form, or who has friends so afflicted should hesitate to write to

"Don't Marry Through Pity."

By Beatrice Fairfax.

IT has been said, "Of all the paths that lead to a woman's love, pity's the straightest." This may be true as regards maternal, platonic, or protective love, but it is not true in respect to the love a woman feels for the man who is to her the one man of all the world.

Pity arouses all that is best in woman, tenderness, gentleness, sympathy; but I doubt if many women fall in love through pity. They generally fall in love because they can't help themselves—because some force stronger than they compels them.

To really love a man a woman must feel that he is stronger than she in every way; when she pities him she at once assumes the leading part.

A woman sometimes marries a man through pity; she persuades herself that she loves him; that he needs her, and that she can be of service to him.

The love that many women feel for their husbands is of the maternal order, and of its kind it is a very good love; but it is not the highest deepest love, the love which glorifies the whole earth simply because two people dwell on it.

A certain element of pity mingles in all love, but it is the result of love, not the forerunner. With real love comes a passion of tenderness that is half pity, half fierce protectiveness and wholly love.

Some women marry through pity and because they are in love with being loved. Marriages of this kind are risky, as pity grows monotonous, and love must give as well as take.

Pity is a beautiful quality, and the woman in whose breast it does not slumber is a strange anomaly.

Of course there are exceptions to every rule, and pity does occasionally lead to love. We hear of hospital nurses falling in love with men whom they have nursed through serious illness. Their pity and sympathy have been stirred, and they have grown to love their patients. This love is apt to last because it has taken root and thrived in the most adverse circumstances.

These is only one thing to marry for, and that is love. Do not mistake pity for love. Do not think because you feel sorry for a man that you can marry him and live happily with him. The very thing that arouses your pity may be the stumbling block to your happiness.

To pity a person is to acknowledge a certain amount of failure in him, and when the pity wears out it is quite likely that the love that grew from it will wear out, too.—New York Journal.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON COMMENTS FOR AUGUST 7.

Subject: God Taking Care of Elijah, I Kings, xvii., 1-16—Golden Text, I Pet., v., 7—Memory Verses, 13, 14—Commentary on the Day's Lesson.

I. Elijah and his message (v. 1). 1. "Elijah." This prophet comes suddenly upon the scene. The schools of the prophets seem to have had their origin in Samuel's day, and were founded in various parts of the land and in connection with them Elijah appears. 1. His name means "My God is Jehovah." 2. He was born at Thisbe, in the tribe of Naphtali, and was therefore called the Tishbite. 3. Tradition tells us that in appearance he was a man of short statue and rugged countenance. "Of Gilead." The only Thisbe mentioned in history in Galilee, hence we conclude that although a native of the tribe of Naphtali in Galilee, he had become a citizen of Gilead east of the Jordan. "Unto Ahab." Probably in the palace in Samaria. What courage and faith this must have taken! "As the Lord * * * liveth." As Jehovah liveth. Elijah begins by giving the authority for his message. As sure as God lives, so certain it will be that the prediction I am about to make will take place. "I stand." As a servant or ambassador. Elijah was accountable directly to God. "Dew nor rain." A terrible threat for a country annually parched by six months' drought, and only saved from utter barrenness by the early rains of autumn. "These years." From Luke 4: 25, and James 5: 17, we learn that the famine lasted three and a half years. From I Kings 18: 1 we learn that the famine ended in the third year, "which means, perhaps, the third year of Elijah's stay in Zarephath." "My word." That is, as the Lord should proclaim His will through Elijah. The famine was the necessary preparation for Elijah's reform. It was a direct attack upon Baal, who was regarded as the god of all natural forces, and the test would show his impotency.

II. Elijah fed by ravens (vs. 2-7). 2. "Came." How, we know not. God's object was to protect Elijah from the rage of Ahab and Jezebel. 3. Leave Samaria and "withdrew from the haunts of men." "Hide thyself." For the king that sent to every land to find him (I Kings 18: 10) would take every possible means to compel him to speak the word of power that would bring rain. When God intended to send rain He bade Elijah to show himself to Ahab (chapter 18: 1). "Brook Cherith." A torrent bed, a deep ravine, down which in rainy times a strong stream flowed. The situation of Cherith has not been identified. It is probable that Cherith was east of the Jordan. Eusebius and Jerome place it there. 4. "Commanded the ravens." This plain, positive statement defies all attempts to explain the facts stated in verse six on rational or natural principles.

5. "Did according." He took the word of the Lord in the hand of faith, as the staff of his pilgrimage, and journeyed forward; and, whenever he grew weary, he leaned upon his staff, and his strength revived; and when danger threatened him by the way, in view of this staff he was not afraid. 6. "Ravens brought him." The bringing to Elijah of suitable food was evidently miraculous. "Bread and flesh." Ravens feed on insects and carrion themselves, yet they brought the prophet man's meat and wholesome food. As this was the food appointed by the Lord for the prophet, we may conjecture that it was the food of the people. 7. "After a while." Probably about a year. "Brook dried up." If this stream had not dried up crowds of people would have been brought thither for water, and thus his retreat would have been discovered.

III. Elijah at Zarephath (vs. 8-16). 9. "Zarephath." The Sarepta of Luke 4: 26. It was a city of Zidon in the dominions of Ethbaal, Jezebel's father. It was very much as if one flying from a lion was directed to seek refuge in a lion's den. "A widow woman." The condition of the widows in the East is helpless in the extreme, so that to receive support from such a source would be another trial to Elijah's faith. It was like leaning his weight on a support as frail as a spider's web.

10. "He arose." His course was not to reason and to speculate, but to hear and obey. "Gate." The abject poverty of the widow is seen from her coming forth to pick up chance bits of wood which might have fallen from the trees outside the city walls. "The widow." A widow.—R. V. It was "the" widow whom God had commanded, but Elijah at first saw only "a" widow, not then knowing this was the one God had designated. "A little water." His first need after his long journey through famine stricken Israel would be water. The gift of water to the thirsty is always regarded as a sacred duty in the East. Then, too, as Guthrie says, this test would let Elijah know whether he had found the one to whom he had been sent.

11. "As she was going." She readily went at the first word. She objected not at the present scarcity, nor asked what he would give for a draught, nor hinted he was a stranger, but left, gathering sticks for herself to fetch water for him. "Morsel of bread." No doubt the prophet was sadly in need of it; doubtless, too, he was listening for divine directions. 12. "Thy God liveth." She recognized Elijah as a worshiper of Jehovah, and her words indicated a reverence for God and some knowledge of His ways. "Cake." The smallest kind of bread. A flat, oval cake of unleavened dough about ten inches in diameter. "Meal." Wheat, ground in a hand mill. "Barrel." An earthen jar. "Oil." Olive oil. To eat with bread as we do butter. "Cruse." A flask for liquids. "Two sticks." As among the Germans at this day "two was then equivalent to a few. "Eat it, and die." The famine prevailed there, and she was in the last extremity.

13. "Fear not." Have no fears about the future; trust God. "First." This was a test of her faith in God, and would show whether she was worthy of the help Elijah offered. It was necessary in order to make the provision for her wants a real blessing. Here is a faith manifested by this poor heathen woman such as was not found in Israel. Jesus found a similar faith in a woman of this same land (Matt. 15: 28). 14. "Barrel * * * not waste, etc." A special miracle, but God's common way of providing for man's common wants is a wonder daily repeated. The teeming earth is like one vast granary which God keeps ever full. "Until the day." It is supposed that he was in Zarephath about two and a half years. 15. "Went and did." The increase of this widow's faith was as great a miracle in the kingdom of grace as the increase of her oil in the kingdom of providence.

16. "Wasted not." Here was an exhibition of that same divine power that in the person of Jesus multiplied the loaves and fishes.

ABOUT REGISTERING.

Extracts from the general election law of Alabama:

Section 2. The following persons shall be disqualified both from registering and voting: All idiots and insane persons; those who were by reason of conviction of crime disqualified from voting at the time of the ratification of the constitution on November 28, 1901; those who have been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted of treason, murder, arson, embezzlement, malfeasance in office, larceny, receiving stolen property, obtaining money under false pretenses, perjury, subornation of perjury, robbery, assault with intent to rob, burglary, forgery, bribery, assault and battery on wife, bigamy, living in adultery, sodomy, incest, rape, miscegenation, crime against nature, or any crime punishable by imprisonment in penitentiary, or for any infamous crimes or crime involving moral turpitude; also, any person who has been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted as a vagrant or tramp, or of selling or offering to sell his vote or the vote of another, or of making or offering to make false returns in any election by the people or in any primary election to procure the nomination or election of any person to any office, or of suborning any witness or registrar to secure the registration of any person as an elector, provided that any person who is disqualified from voting by reason of conviction of any of the offenses mentioned in this section, except treason, whether the conviction was had in a state or federal court, has been pardoned, may be restored to his citizenship with right to vote by the governor, approved by the board of pardons and specially expressed in the pardon.

Sec. 7 1-2. The following persons and no others, who, if their place of residence shall remain unchanged, will have, at the date of the next general election, the qualifications as to residence prescribed by section 1 of this act, shall be qualified to register as electors, provided they shall not be disqualified under section 2 of this act:

1st. Those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who are physically unable to work; and those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who have worked or been regularly engaged in some lawful employment, business or occupation, trade or calling for the greater part of the twelve months next preceding the time they offer to register, and those who are unable to read and write, if such inability is due solely to physical disability; or,

2d. The owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of forty acres of land situate in this state, upon which they reside; or the owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of any woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of real estate situate in this state, assessed for taxation at the value of three hundred dollars or more or the owner in good faith, in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith, in her own right, of personal property in this state assessed for taxation for three hundred dollars or more; provided, that the taxes due upon such real or personal property for the year next preceding the year in which he offers to register shall have been paid, unless the assessment shall have been legally contested and is undetermined.

Sec. 15. Any elector who registered prior to January 1, 1903, who has changed the county of his residence shall be registered on application on production of his certificate, unless he has since become disqualified.

Sec. 16. When the certificate of any elector who was duly registered has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, on application stating that the certificate has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, and verified by affidavit, and it appears of record that such applicant has been registered, the judge of probate of the county of registration or the secretary of state shall issue to the applicant a certificate that he was duly registered as an elector Such certificate shall be issued free of charge to the elector. The secretary of state shall at the expense of the state furnish the judge of probate blank certificates for use as provided in this section.

The certificate of the registrars or the judge of probate or of the secretary of state shall be sufficient to establish the fact of such registration.

Be sure and register when the registrars are in your beat, as the only excuse for not doing so is by reason of sickness of yourself or in your family, or by absence from the county. Everybody can register this summer who will be qualified by residence or age by the 8th day of November. Poll tax paying has nothing to do with registration; you can register now and pay your poll tax afterwards, but you can not vote unless you are both registered and have paid your poll tax (if any is due). The period of residence necessary to register is two years in the state, one year in the county, and three months in the beat. If you have moved from one beat to another in the county less than three months before election day, you can vote in your old beat, so you don't lose your vote by changing. Any one who desires to register with property qualification should bring with him his last assessment and tax collector's receipt to show the registrars as proof that he is possessed of such property, and has paid taxes on it. You can register ANY of the following heads

1. If you own 40 acres or more in this state, and reside upon it.

2. If your wife owns 40 acres more land in this state upon which you reside.

3. If you own real estate in this state that is assessed for taxation $300 or more.

4. If your wife owns real estate in this state assessed for taxation $300 or more.

5. If you own personal property in this state assessed for taxation $300 or more.

6. If your wife owns personal property in this state assessed for taxation for $300 or more.

7. If you can read any section of the constitution of the United States.

Don't give up your right to vote because you get married, you only have to show it to the registrars in case you have moved from some other county.

THE UNION will furnish any information on any special point they may be in doubt upon and are ready to help any one to get all the rights he is entitled to under the constitution of Alabama. If you think you are entitled to register and the registrars should refuse you, take a couple of good men with you so you can get witnesses as to such refusal and the reasons given by the registrars, and thereby be enabled to take your case up to higher authority.

SEVEN GIRLS DROWN

While Bathing in the Mississippi River Just Below Alton, Ill.

ONLY ONE SAVED OUT OF EIGHT.

Were in the Care of a Good Swimmer But in Their Fright Impeded His Movements.

While bathing in the Mississippi River Michael Riley, daughter and six of the latter's little girl friends were drowned. One child who was in the party was rescued.

Riley lived near the river in the southern part of Alton, Ill., and was accustomed to bathe on the beach in front of his home after his return from work.

His little daughter begged to go with him, and Riley took her and several of her little friends to the beach with him. When they entered the water they bade the children join hands, and they all waded into the water and walked along a sandbar which stretches out into the stream at that point.

They had gone some distance from the shore, when suddenly the whole party disappeared beneath the water, having in the darkness stepped from the sandbar into the deep channel.

Riley, who is said to have been a good swimmer, is thought to have been made helpless by the girls clinging to him and hampering his efforts to save them.

Fight Just Outside Port Arthur.

Admiral Togo cables that an exciting torpedo destroyer fight took place off Port Arthur on Friday evening, when the Japanese torpedo destroyers Asashio and Obosa approached the entrance of the harbor for the purpose of reconnoitering.

Fourteen torpedo boat destroyers finally shed out, separated and endeavored to surround the Japanese boats. The Asashio broke through the cordon, however, driving three or four of the Russian boats. At this point the Japanese torpedo destroyer Ironmo joined the other two, and the three turned and attacked the eleven Russian boats. The latter retired within the harbor. The Japanese boats were uninjured. No damage to the Russian ships is known.

The two southern cities—Birmingham and Nashville—have ever been honored by the body in the selection of places of meeting.

JEWELS VALUED AT $200,000

Stolen From Summer Home of New Yorker. No Clue at Present, but the Police Are at Work.

The most extensive jewelry robbery ever perpetrated in this country, involving a loss of $200,000, is reported to be engaging the attention of the police and scores of private detectives in eastern cities. Great secrecy surrounds the robbery, which appears to have been committed about June 21 in the Newport residence of a prominent New Yorker, whose name is withheld. Diamonds and other precious stones valued at the sum mentioned are missing. The matter has only become public through the publication of a list of the missing jewels. Orders have been issued to spare no expense or labor to find the robbers and restore the gems, and every suggestion that could aid in the discovery has been covered, but thus far the case is involved in mystery.

KILLED HIS FATHER

And Then Beat His Brother-in-Law While on a Drunken Spree.

Matthew Driggers was shot and killed at Arcadia, Fla., by his son, Charles, who was insanely intoxicated at the time.

Driggers had threatened his wife and driven her from home when his father called to see him, and at the time was having a quarrel with his brother-in-law, who was also intoxicated. Matthew Driggers went into the house and his son followed, drew his revolver and shot him four times, the fatal wound being in the head.

After killing his father Charles Driggers went out on the front porch, where his brother-in-law, W. Hidden, was lying in a drunken stupor, and beat him over the head with his revolver. Young Driggers is now in jail.

Toulon Suffers a Disastrous Fire.

Fire broke out in the arsenal at Toulon, France, Sunday. The fire spread rapidly and threatened to embrace entire blocks of buildings.

The troops were at once called out and mustered in the street. The prefect of the maritime port is organizing assistance and admirals and generals are helping in the work at the pumps.

A division of the reserve squadron has been called upon to aid.

Within an hour after the fire broke out the entire population was aroused. Guns are being fired as signals for help, which is coming in from the whole countryside.

The flames are spreading with the greatest rapidity.

Six southern states produce pig iron—Alabama, Virginia, Maryland, West Virginia, Tennessee and Kentucky. The production of the six states in 1903 was 3,149,824 tons. Alabama's production is almost half of the entire southern production.

THROUGH THE BRIDGE

Colorado Passenger Train is Wrecked and Persons Killed and Drowned.

BRIDGE WEAKENED BY RAINS.

Death List Will Reach Nearly 100. Cars Washed Down Stream. Express Safe Empty.

A Rio Grande passenger train went through a bridge at Eden, Colo., Sunday night. The engine and five coaches were wrecked and a number of passengers injured. The accident was caused by the heavy rain, which weakened the bridge. The extent of the injuries to the passengers is not known, but it is rumored that about 100 persons perished.

The wrecked train was the Missouri Pacific world's fair flyer, the fastest train sent out of Denver by the Denver and Rio Grande, and usually carries a heavy passenger list.

A message from the Pinon railroad agent said that he could find no trace of the engine and three of the cars. He found the fireman wandering about in a dazed condition, looking for the engineer, and could hear the cries of the unfortunates. He said that the conductor, engineer and brakeman are among the dead.

The bodies of three young women, unidentified, washed down Fountain river. J. M. Killen, a Pueblo business man, injured, but not seriously, was washed down the river a distance of a mile, when he was enabled to crawl out on the bank.

A dispatch to the general office of the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad company says that the number of passengers in the smoker and chair car are estimated at seventy, only three of whom are accounted for as living.

The train dashed through a bridge over Dry creek, an arroyo fifty feet across, near Eden. A cloudburst had filled the creek and water was flowing over the trestle when the train started across. The bridge went down under the weight of the train, and the baggage car, smoker and chair car were precipitated into the torrent. The engine got almost across, but fell back into the water.

The chair car was half a mile from the scene of the accident, half filled with sand, in which were found buried the bodies of many passengers.

The smoker was washed still further down stream and was not located until several hours after the time of the accident.

When Division Superintendent Bowren reached the scene of the wreck the missing cars had not been located, and passengers and train hands who accompanied him organized searching parties to follow the course of the river. The three cars were found close to the shore in Fountain creek, of which Dry creek is a tributary, and which in turn flows into the Arkansas river.

Whether the engine and the torrent of water from the cloudburst struck the bridge simultaneously or the torrent had already undermined the structure is not known, but the reports at the Denver office say that the air was turned on and that this saved the diner and sleepers from being precipitated into the creek.

Most of the dead were in the cars buried under the debris.

Fireman Mayfield said as the engine struck the trestle it seemed to rear and fall on its side. The fireman jumped and escaped.

When the baggage car, smoker and chair car left the tracks and plunged into the stream they were swept down by the current and the trucks torn off. This lightened them, and the volume of water can be understood when it is reported by Superintendent Bowren that they were carried four miles before they came ashore.

PASSENGER TRAIN COLLISION

On the Louisville and Nashville Railroad. Thirty-three Injured.

Two Louisville and Nashville passenger trains met head-on early Thursday morning near Horse Cave, Ky.

Thirty-three passengers and four thought, will die. The condition of trainmen were injured, but none, it is Engineer Rehm is serious.

According to the information Rehm either disregarded orders or was sound asleep, as his train was going at a forty-mile clip when it struck the north-bound passenger. One baggage car was destroyed and one postal car damaged, but none of the coaches left the track.

Gen. W. W. Brandon, who is to command the provisional regiment which goes to Manassas from Alabama, gave out the following as the companies so far selected to go to make up the regiment which will probably leave Alabama September 3:

Mobile company, commanded by Capt. John D. Hagan; Fort Deposit, by Capt. H. H. Coleman; Dothan, by Capt. J. W. Sanders; Gadsden, by Capt. L. B. Rainey; Oxford and Anniston, by Capt. D. Money for Education.

The adoption of the plan of special taxation for school purposes in Jefferson county will give to the children of that county for educational purposes $49,000 in excess of what they now receive. The present appropriation from the state is $32,000, showing that by the action of this law two sources of educational revenue provide $81,000, and also that the special taxes amount to more than the state appropriation.

Talladega county, which was one of the first to vote the extra tax, will receive from it $7,087 on the present valuation of property, which will give, with the state fund, $16,145, an annual fund of $23,000 in round figures.

Walker county has also voted the tax It will receive from it $5,000 to go along with $12,380 now received from the state.

BACK TO WORK.

Alabama Consolidated Coal and Iron Company Signs the Contract.

The Alabama Consolidated Coal and Iron company, Col. T. G. Bush president, has signed the temporary contract or wage scale with the United Mine Workers of America, District No. 20, and work resumed at all their mines Monday.

The temporary contract is the same scale of wages which was in effect prior to July 1.

The Alabama Consolidated company owns and operates mines at Searles, Brookwood and Hewitt, in Tuskaloosa county, on the Birmingham and Mineral railroad, and at Lewisburg, in Jefferson county. Employment is given to about 600 mine workers.

Stores Burned.

George W. Wise's general merchandise store, Richard Rousseau's grocery store and Joseph Ward's meat market and residence were destroyed in a fire in Dallas village, near Huntsville, early Saturday morning. The fire started in Wise's and was communicated to the other stores adjoining. Several other merchants lost heavily by removing their goods.

Cost of Living.

Carroll D. Wright, commissioner of the labor bureau, gives the results of a comprehensive inquiry into the cost of living since 1896 and into the average wage rate during that period. An investigation of 519 occupations, representing sixty-seven industries, shows an average increase in wages of 16.6 per cent. The cost of living for workingmen's families, having under $1,200 income per year, shows an increase of 15.5 per cent.

The plant of the Tuskaloosa Light and Ice company was completely destroyed on the 5th of last August by the explosion of its boilers. The above claims are for the damage done by the immense twenty-one ton boiler, which was blown across the city, dealing destruction as it shot through the air for several blocks.

Last week's attendance at the world's fair was 601,411.

BETROTHED

The early joy of a young man and maid,
Who stand upon the threshold of life's morn
Hand linked in hand, while all for them is fair
With rosy promise of a day to be;
Who know how each to each is all in all.

Be each to each is of the other sure.
Come weal or woe, the sunshine or the rain.
This thing is good. For even tho' it be
That the full promise of dawn is unfulfilled.
And winds arise the landscape fair to mar
By mists and shadows no man may foresee.
The perfect vision of the opening day
Remains for them a blessed memory
Thro' all the day, until all light is gone.

Closed by the last chime of the curfew.
Yet
To have known that glory of dawn still makes the day
More beautiful than tho' it had not been.
Most happy they for whom this time shall prove
The first sweet moments of an ample day!
To those for whom, until the morning came,
Life had been but a twilight-time wherein
Each had moved solitary amid the crowd,
Lonely in spirit, lonely in heart and mind,
The coming of this dawn makes all things new.

For them the world is as another world;
They are themselves, yet not their former selves,
And half-forgetful of all former hours,
With Love arisen they live alone no more.

THE RED CHIMNEYS

By MRS. STEPHEN CRANE

Copyright, 1901, by Daily Story Publishin g Company.

When the wind came there was a rain of maple leaves, weary and withered souls swept from the grayed branches, falling to swift currents near the ground where they swirled in yellow hosts, raising upon the air a long sound of crackling cries, a curious interminable noise of dismay at death, of fear of this implacable sweeping force that came from the red western sky which flared like an army with lurid banners.

A girl came slowly down the path that led through the maples. She walked in a dreamy way, following unconsciously the mere indication of a road, that summer path that had been swallowed in the merciless hail of the dead leaves. Finally, a man stepped from the shadows. He was smiling as he put forth his hand.

"Hello," he said.

When their hands clasped, she began to look at the dark distance of the landscape, turning her face from him.

"Well," he said at last, studying the immobile face, still holding her hand, "are you glad to see me? I just returned yesterday on the New York. Very breezy trip. I thought I had better——" then suddenly he threw away all that and spoke quickly: "And your husband?"

She made a gesture towards where three brick chimneys appeared in the distance, looming above a rim of tree tops. They both steadily regarded these as if they were three personages, three facts, emblematic exactly of a certain situation. He, with his cigarette now in his mouth, his hat still tilted, clasping his hands, said: "The infernal idiot!"

She looked at him with a swift, resentful glance, but he answered at once, making a gesture of irritation which was a sort of defiant outburst. "Oh, I am tired of treating him with magnificent respect, when, as a matter of truth, he is to me the most stupid and dense beast in the universe for not being dead."

She was lifting her chin in a battleful way and waving her fingers toward his mouth. "But he is my——"

"The devil," interrupted the young man, violently. "Do you think that I am not aware of it?" He glared at her with sullen rage.

Upon her face as she looked at him there was a vague, indescribable smile and in her eyes there were two faint points of mellow light. "Yes, you do know it," she said.

He answered her attitude, the light in her eyes. "You love me," he cried in discontented muttering, "and yet you spend all your time in guarding the peace of that duffer"—indicating the three red chimneys with a contemptuous wave of his hand—"as if he were a sacred white elephant of Siam; and, as for me, I am to be held off with spears for fear I might kiss the tip of your little finger. And yet you love me. You are incomprehensible. I could kill him. And yet—you—why won't you run away with me?"

Looming Above a Rim of Treetops.

When she replied her voice had a subtle quality of monotony in it as if she were speaking a lesson, uttering some sentiment in which she had resolutely schooled herself. "Ah, the sin. You would never be happy with a bad woman."

It seemed to make him furious. He gazed at her blackly. "A bad woman! What rot! You——"

Then she suddenly acknowledged the falsity of her speech. "No—no—no, I didn't mean that, I didn't mean it, I meant that I—I could never be happy

One Long Kiss.

if I were a bad woman. I would be afraid"—she raised her finger and pointed it mournfully at him—"I would be afraid of you."

He laughed savagely. "You are as wise as seven owls. It cannot be argued. It is to be demonstrated. A renewal of my protestations of love would not be convincing." He burst out passionately, as if he could no longer endure the weight of his hopes, his fears, his wrongs. "But why not make an attempt for happiness? You love me. I love you. What is there in this infernal environment that should make us value it? What is there to suffice us if we have not each other. Nothing, I tell you, nothing."

"Wait," she said. "God forgive us—it cannot be long to wait now."

"Wait, wait. My soul is weary of this waiting," he answered. "He will never die: he is too selfish; he will see us both in our graves, I tell you. Is all our youth to be worn threadbare waiting for this selfish brute to shuffle off?" He looked at her steadily for a moment, then continued: "Do you know that I believe that in spite of the life he has led you, you love him, now, more than you do me."

She was very white and the pain in her eyes should have warned him.

"No," he said, "four years is long enough to wait; long enough for you to make up your mind. Do you know that you have played fast and loose with me for four years? Four—long—years? Now you must decide. Will you come with me, dear heart, will you come with me? Say—speak—will you come to the shelter of my love or do you send me away forever? I will wait no longer; I am determined; choose—him——" and he shook his closed hands at the red chimneys—"or happiness with me!"

The girl shivered and drew her cape closely about her shoulders. As she moved a faint perfume of lavender came to the man. He took hold of both her hands with his and drew her to him, eagerly, gazing at her face, so close to his own, noting every feature, the small straight nose, the forehead low and broad, crowned with masses of dark waving hair, the small rounded chin beneath the sweet trembling mouth! And her eyes—her eyes, now dark with the pain of this passion which she felt was mastering her. She could feel his warm breath upon her cheeks. Her hands crept up his arms and about his neck; she threw her head back and as she did—their lips met in one long kiss.

* * * * *

The following morning the man awakened with a song upon the lips that she had kissed. As he dressed he strutted as a self-satisfied cock might strut while he plumed himself in the barnyard. They were to leave that night. Of course nothing could prevent her going, now—nothing but death," she had said. All the morning he was busy arranging his affairs for a long absence.

At noon came a messenger with a note. It was from her. How well he knew the gray paper and the dainty writing! He caressed the envelope before he opened it. "Why, I am getting as sentimental as a woman," he said aloud, laughingly. Then he tore the note open and this is what it said:

"Forgive, forgive me, my beloved. I have chosen death. I could not leave him and after yesterday there is no peace for me but in death. Forgive me, for I have loved you more than life."

* * * * *

The woman killed herself on October the 9th. Her husband died of a long, lingering illness on October 10th.

Under the maples the man walked and the little leaves of brown and yellow and those with the crimson blots danced about him. The man had grown old in two days, frost had touched his temples and his face was gray and drawn. He looked at the red chimneys above the tree tops; he held out his arms towards them, yearningly, with a half-stifled moan. The little leaves danced and flew in clouds before his eyes, they beat him upon the face; they seemed to run and jump before his sight, blinding him, stinging him, as he held his arms towards the red chimneys.

WEALTHY MEN OF OLD.

Their Fortunes Make Even Rockefeller's Millions Seem Small.

A writer in a Jewish magazine has been looking into the Agadic history of the Talmud, and believes that there were richer men before the Christian era than there are now. We know that Croesus was rich, and that there were huge Roman fortunes in the times of the empire. The Talmud stories go back further still. The great corner in corn that Joseph managed was fabulously profitable. Tradition says that Joseph, acting for Pharaoh, got his hands on pretty much all the ready money there was in his day, and buried three enormous treasures, one of which was found by Korah, whose fortune estimated according to the modern standards of value, is rated by the magazine at three billion dollars. Solomon's stable, with its horses, chariots and horsemen, is said to have represented a sum the modern equivalent of which would be three or four hundred millions, and he spent two hundred and fifty millions on his temple. Herod's temple cost more still. In Jerusalem in Roman times there were three Jews, who between them, felt able to face an expenditure of a hundred millions a year for twenty-one years. They offered to feed the million inhabitants of Jerusalem for that length of time rather than surrender the city. One of these Jews, Nikodemon, gave his daughter a dowry of $425,000,000. There were other Jews of whose enormous wealth the Agadic history makes record.—Harper's Weekly.

Juggling With Accounts.

John D. Rockefeller, at a directors' meeting in New York, was describing certain methods of juggling with accounts—certain deceptive ledger and journal entries that firms make when they are about to fail dishonestly.

"The other day," said Mr. Rockefeller, "I heard of a woman who would have made an excellent account juggler. This woman's husband always left in her possession a number of blank signed checks. She was free to use these checks, but he required from her a full explanation of the expenditure that had been made with each of them.

'He was looking over the stubs one day.

"'You say here,' he said, 'that check No. 272, for $25, went for church expenses. What church expenses were these?'

"'A new Easter bonnet,' the woman answered."

Maranda.

A crescent moon lingers to greet the morn,
The star of beauty smiling in its rays;
The birds sing low—as wooing their own lays;
The young May-blossoms freshened zephyrs warn,
Lest closer touching win, not bud, but thorn;
The air breathes lover's breath on fainting haze;
While Silence, eloquent with voiceless praise,
Guards well the stillness—and the day is born.

The poet's soul saw type of this fair hour
In sacred recess of a living heart;
Its peerless melody, its bloom, its flower,
Its beauty, and its mystery are part
Of hymnic music, telling of sunrise
In the soft shadows of a maiden's eyes.
—Mary M. Adams, from "The Song at Midnight."

Church Pews as Investments.

At Kirkham (Eng.) Parish church the greater portion of the pew rents, instead of swelling the exchequer of the church, go into the pockets of private individuals, who, for the most part, do not attend the church or even reside in the district. The peculiar situation originated in 1823, when, to meet the expenses of rebuilding the church, about forty pews and a few organ seats were put up for auction and realized amounts varying from $175 to $900. The church wardens are endeavoring to come to an arrangement with the pew owners with a view to securing a larger share of the rents for the benefit of the church.

WIFE WAS JUSTLY INDIGNANT.

Husband's Failure to "Bawl" at Her Demise Was Too Much.

Mrs. Letitia Tyler Semple, who was mistress of the White House during President Tyler's administration, has just celebrated in Washington her eighty-third birthday.

"The statesman I liked best in my youth was Daniel Webster," Mrs. Semple said the other day. "He was a handsome man and talked well. I remember a banquet one night when the subject of death and dying came up, and Mr. Webster told us a story that was half funny and half pathetic.

"He said that an old woman lay very ill and after a time she went off into a trance. She lay so still in this trance that they thought the end had come, and when she opened her eyes again at last her husband said to her in a surprised tone:

"'Why, Mandy, we thought ye wuz dead.'

"The poor woman looked at her husband a moment and then she burst into tears.

"'An' ye never bawled a bit,' she sobbed. 'Ye thought I wuz dead and yer eyes wuz dry. Couldn't ye have bawled a little bit, Jabez?'

"The old man was deeply moved, and he did actually bawl then. But his wife said sadly:

"'It's too late now. Dry yer eyes. If I'd really been dead and ye'd bawled 'twould have done me some good. But it's too late now.'"

JUST A "'MAGINARY PICTURE."

Grandson Put John D. Rockefeller in Retail Business.

John D. Rockefeller has a little grandson something over half a dozen years of age of whom he is very fond. One day recently this youngster while visiting at the Rockefeller country home at Pocantico Hills, New York, mounted his grandparent's knee and said:

"Grandpa, here's a picture of you that I drawed."

"Ah, yes," replied Mr. Rockefeller, as he examined it. "Very interesting. What am I doing?"

"Coming home from the village store."

"Yes, yes; I see. But what's that I have in my hand?"

"That's a gallon oil can. You've just got it filled with kerosene and are fetching it home for the lamps. Of course," the artist continued in patronizingly explanatory tones, "it's a 'maginary picture. 'Tain't drawed from seeing you do it, you know. I fought it all up in my own head."—New York Times.

Garden Song.

Forgive me, in that I kissed your lips
Too fiercely or too soon;
It was the fault of the nightingale
Singing against the moon.
If Reason swerved in a brief eclipse
The while I sinned my sin,
Opposed to Love, it must always fail
Since Love must always win.

The flowers rejoiced in that kiss of ours,
Even as they were fain
The great night moths should ravage their hearts,
Seeking for golden gain;
Bringing them pollen from other flowers,
Set open through the night
To play their motionless, mystic parts
In Nature's marriage rite.

And who was I, to resist, withstand
That charm of fragrant gloom?
A summer night has a thousand powers
Of scent and stars and bloom.
Forgive me, in that my errant hand
Caressed your silken hair.
O, lay the blame on the Orange flowers,
You know how sweet they were!

Sell Genuine for Imitation.

Prof. Ray Lankester, the British scientist, has brought to light a curious trick practiced by London dealers in osprey plumes. Some time ago the princess of Wales placed herself at the head of a movement to discourage the use of real osprey plumes in order to save the birds from slaughter. The result was an immediate decline in the sale, since fashion could not fly in the face of the princess of Wales. But recently facts have come to the notice of Prof. Lankester showing that among certain fashionable milliners it has become a practice to sell genuine plumes as imitations.

His Demise Postponed.

One of the German attendants at the morgue was standing at the corner of Twenty-first street and First avenue, when his attention was attracted by a man who seemed to be suffering from the effects of a severe jag.

"Where's the morgue?" demanded the inebriate.

"I am de morgue. Vat you vant?" said Fred, the attendant.

"I want to be locked up," replied the man with the jag.

"But you are not dead. You must be dead first."

"That's so; that's so. I never thought of that," mused the drunk. And as he ambled up the street he looked back, waved his hand and shouted: "So long, old man. I'll see you later."—New York Telegraph.

What True Love Is.

Sincere, serious love is never love at first sight.

When one look—and the first one, too—binds a man and woman, you may be sure that one single word will soon be sufficient to unbind them.

Lasting love comes slowly, progressively.

Beauty is not the mother of love. On the contrary, it is often love which engenders beauty—gives brilliancy to the eyes, gracefulness to the body, vibration to the voice.

The face, which reflects all the inner sentiments of the heart, betrays the love of its owner, and is beautiful.

Absence is a tonic for love only when men and women love with all their heart and soul. When they do not, the ancient proverb is still true: "Far from the eyes, far from the heart."—Max O'Rell.

How Two Monarchs Died

M. Paul Gaulot's "A Conspiracy Under the Terror," which has just been published, suggests to me another reason, beside that of the contrast between their characters, for the contrast between the death scenes of Louis XVI and of Marie Antoinette, writes T. P. O'Connor. Not the least horrible of all the haunting horrors of "The Terror" is the death struggle on the scaffold of Louis XVI.

Here is Louis Blanc's description of it in his "Histoire de la Revolution Francaise": "Descending from his carriage, Louis fixed his eyes upon the soldiers who surrounded him, and with a menacing voice cried, 'Silence!' The drums ceased to beat, but at a signal from their officer the drummers again went on. 'What treason is this?' he shouted. 'I am lost! I am lost!' For it was evident up to this moment he had been clinging to hope. The executioners now approached to take off a part of his clothes; he repulsed them fiercely, and himself removed the collar from his neck. All the blood in his frame seemed to be turned into fire when they sought to tie his hands. 'Tie my hands!' he shrieked. A struggle was inevitable. It came. It is indisputable that Louis fought with his executioners.

"The Abbe Edgeworth stood by, perplexed, horrified, speechless. At last, as his master seemed to look inquiringly at him, he said: 'Sir, in this additional outrage, I only see a last trait of the resemblance between your majesty and the God who will give you your reward.' At these words the indignation of the man gave way to the humility of the Christian, and Louis said to the executioners, 'I [illegible] the cup to the dregs.'

"But after the executio[illegible] made all the grim toilet of d[illegible] Louis had protested his innoc[illegible] pronounced his forgiveness [illegible] loud voice, which the dru[illegible] the command of the com[illegible] gayon, proceeded to drown, [illegible] lost all his self-control. Girl Had Her Way

She was in love with a young doctor.

"He's quite impossible!" cried her mother when informed of it.

"Out of the question," asserted her father.

"He has fine prospects," insisted the girl.

"You can't live on prospects," said the father.

The next day she was ill.

"I can see nothing wrong," said the physician who was called to attend her.

Nevertheless he left a prescription, but it seemed to be no good. The symptoms she described were conflicting and confusing.

"It's very strange," said the physician.

"If you do not understand the case, we must get someone who does," said the mother.

So, after a week or more of experimenting another physician was called in.

"A trifling indisposition," said the second physician. "I'll have her right in a day or so."

But in a day or so she had him rattled. Her lover had told her how to do it.

"Every time I see her," said the second physician, "there seem[illegible] some new complication. I c[illegible] anything radically wrong. [illegible] statements certainly show t[illegible] is not all right."

A Halsted Street Pastoral

"Little Barefoot," of Bubbly Creek.

Her father twists the lever on a Halsted trolley train.
At noon she brings his dinner pail,
drenched in the pelting rain.
She has a piquant rose-leaf face, a roguish head of hair;
She is the mascot of the car, the passengers declare.
And when her father eats his lunch, she grasps the trolley bar—
"Now, Daddy, you just lemme be, and I will run the car—
Of course I've got 'em beat a block; you see the coast is clear.
Say, Daddy, how do you like to see me play the engineer?"

REFRAIN.

"Now, all aboard, get ready; say, Miss
Rosey, hold her steady,
I can run the trolley car, betause my daddy's near.
Don't you hear that whistle blowing, to old Bubbly Creek we're going—
Say, daddy, don't you like to see me play
the engineer?"

She holds the lever like her dad, and guides the trolley true;
O'er prairies wide they swiftly glide by roses drenched in dew;
O'er bridges high they panting fly, and breast the shrieking gale;
The little lassie's still on deck and guides them o'er the rail.

"Jap" Elixir Is Good

The ingenious Japanese have developed a trade in a commodity which has been decided by the general board of customs appraisers at Washington, to be hitherto unheard of and not enumerated in the Dingley act This is Midzuame, a syrup that finds a demand on the Pacific coast in competition with corn syrup, which is largely produced in Illinois.

Midzuame is a doughy, elastic substance, produced from Japanese millet and rice. The chemists say it is mainly starch and dextrine. The best quality is a fine yellow, and its palatability is beyond all cavil. The producers are themselves great consumers, and seem to thrive on it. The consumption of the new mixture or brew is said to be extending constantly in the West.

Three Words of Strength

There are three lessons I would write
Three words, as with a burning pen,
In tracings of eternal light,
Upon the hearts of men.

Have Hope. Though clouds environ round,
And gladness hides her face in scorn,
Put off the shadow from thy brow;
No night but hath its morn.

Have Faith. Where'er thy barque is driven—
The calm's disport, the tempest's mirth—
Know this: God rules the hosts of heaven,
The inhabitants of earth.

Have Love. Not love alone for one,
But man, as man, thy brother call;
And scatter, like a circling sun,
Thy charities on all.

...Cild's name, Philomene, where did you get these?" he gasped as he sank into a chair.

"A messenger brought them to me this morning," she said wearily. "I do not know who sent them—or why." Then she went on bravely: "Tell me all about them; tell me all about her. Was she—as much to you—did you love her so very, very dearly?" she asked softly. "Is she dead or—"

"No, no, Philomene. I thought I loved her, but it was not real love—I know what that is now. But the story is such a miserable one, I cannot bear to tell it to you. Still, as you say, you have a right to know, and I will tell you all—the whole truth."

"It's So Different, So Different."

"Yes, dear," said Philomene, "all of it, please."

"I met Helen Burnett at a reception given by an artist friend in London. Her wonderful beauty of face and form caught me, and before I knew it I was, as I thought, desperately in love with her. She was an actress—not so great on the stage as she was off it—as I discovered to my sorrow. We left London together and went to Paris—"

"You married her?"

"Well—no, not—you see, she had a husband living somewhere and she had not yet secured—"

A low moan from Philomene caused a spasm of pain to cross The Man's face. He hesitated and then went on.

"But I intended to marry her just as soon as I could do so. Then one day, some kind friend—I never knew who, but I have blessed him ever since—told her that I had reached the end of my fortune; that I was practically a beggar. When she came to me and asked me if the report was true the mist cleared from my eyes, and I saw her as she really was. To get rid of her was my only thought, and so I did not deny the rumor, but allowed her to think that it was true. Later when she found out that she had been duped, she was furious at the loss of her prey, and she swore she would some day get even with me. Fearful of what she might do, I sent a friend to her with instructions to buy from her my letters. She sold them to him for an enormous price; but it seems that she kept a few of them. She has sent them to you—and—well—and that is all."

Philomene looked at The Man's haggard face and a sweet pity stole over her own. Then she slipped quietly around behind him and put her arms around his neck and pressed her face close to his cheek.

"Dearest," she said; "I had thought, in the way all women love to think, that I was the One Woman. But it was foolish of me to think you any less human than other men—and women—" she added after a little pause. "I know that it was only a mad infatuation that carried you off your feet—and I know now it is all a thing of the past. I love you and I forgive you, as I know you would forgive me, were you in my place and I in yours."

"My darling!" cried The Man, and he turned and took her in his arms.

"Would you, dear?" whispered Philomene.

"How could I help it?" said The Man, pressing his lips against her soft cheek.

"Anything? Are you sure; are you very, very sure?" and her sweet gray eyes looked searchingly into his own.

"I am very sure;" The Man said simply.

"Then sit down in this chair; I have something to tell you," said Philomene. The Man obeyed wonderingly. Philomene stood behind where he could not see her, and said, very slowly and hesitatingly:

"In Italy, three years ago, I was the mistress of the Count d'Orsay."

The Man stopped breathing! his face grew a horrible ashen gray, and his lips lost every trace of color.

"I can't believe it," he gasped.

"I swear to you that it is true," said Philomene solemnly.

And it was true. For the Count d'Orsay was my father, and it was while Philomene was in Italy that he was given to her.

The Man sat for a long time with his face hidden in his hands, but he did not speak. At last Philomene said, ever so gently and sorrowfully:

"Now you know, dearest, how great my love is for you. True love is always forgiving. Is your love for me as great as mine for you? I loved the Count d'Orsay"—The Man shuddered—"with a purer, truer love than ever you bestowed on Helen Burnett. Surely that ought to count in my favor. And some day, dearest, when you have forgiven me fully, I will explain it all, and you will be glad that you loved me so well, loved me enough to forgive me, as I have forgiven you."

But The Man only sobbed and murmured: "It's so different, so different."

"No, no, dear, it only seems different. It is really just the same. An unkind world has cast a heavier load of chains upon the woman—that's all—but there is no real difference. But I won't ask you to answer now; you must have time to think. Wait until tomorrow, and then, if you find that your love is as great as mine, you may send me a rose. Good night, dear."

The Man arose and took a few steps toward the door through which she had vanished, then stopped and turning, went blindly out into the night.

I went softly up the stairs to the room where my mistress sat with a strange, frightened look on her face that I was almost frightened, too.

"Oh, Paddy boy," she cried, throwing herself on her knees by my side, and putting her arms around my neck, "Have a done a foolish thing? A dog's love lives while his life lasts. Nothing can shake it; nothing can destroy it. But a man's love—ah, I don't know—I don't know."

But she will know tomorrow.

Wise Man of the Trolley.

"Yes," said the conductor, as he gave the motorman the double ring, "I can tell what day of the week it is by the size of money these young fellows have. Now, there is that kid in front just gave me a five-dollar note and made me hustle for change. That's his salary. He'll be walking down town next Friday morning. That young woman there, who just gave me a dollar bill, had to look through a pocketbook full of samples on Saturday morning to find a nickel."

"But this is Monday," remarked the observant patron, "and I saw a man give you five cents just now. How do you account for that?"

"Oh, that's easy," said the knight of the cord; "he's married."—Baltimore News.

Old China as Table Decorations.

Georgina, countess of Dudley, is said to have been the first hostess who grasped the possibilities of old pieces of gold and silver as table decorations.

Old china lends itself to this purpose as readily, as was proved at the dinner party given by Baron and Baroness Alphonse de Rothschild this week in their fine mansion, Rue Saint Florentin. The flowers were the priceless orchids for which the baron's conservatories at Ferrières are celebrated, and the golden and mauve tints of the exquisite blossoms were thrown into harmonious relief by the pieces of green Sevres china placed on the table. A London hostess not long ago made a sensation by decorating her table entirely with La France roses and using a dinner service of pink Sevres, matching the flowers perfectly. —London Graphic.

The Shopping Spree.

The fascinating bargain ads
Allured her thrifty eye,
And forth she sailed on to hunt,
Beneath a torrid sky.

And Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Jones
And Mrs. Brown she met,
And with them each in turn "stepped in"
And her interior wet.

With Mrs. Johnston next she drank,
And then with Mrs. Hall,
And on her way home, all alone,
She took a final ball.

And though she brought no bargain back
To boast about and brag,
How blissfully she did enjoy
That ice cream soda jag.

Good Services Appreciated.

Citizens of Scarsboro, Poweshiek county, Iowa, gave a banquet the other evening to a gang of sixty Italians who have been working on the Iowa Central improvement and construction work near that town. The banquet was in recognition of the services of the men in putting out a fire that threatened to destroy the town.

Is Authority on Radium.

Dr. Rutherford, a young professor of Montreal, who lately delivered a notable lecture on radium, is recognized as the chief authority of the western hemisphere on that subject. He was, in fact, one of the first to throw light on the nature of radioactivity. Prof. Rutherford is about to publish a book dealing with that topic.

TWO DAGGERS WITH HISTORIES.

One for Which Senator Quay Would Have Traded His.

Senator Quay of Pennsylvania was a collector of Indian relics and took great interest also in autographs, coins and stamps. Often, though, he ridiculed, good naturedly, collectors' hobbies.

He was showing a reporter his Indian robes one day. The young man took up a curious antique dagger that lay on a buhl table.

"This dagger must be very old," he said. "Has it a history?"

"It has indeed," said Senator Quay. "It is the dagger that Macbeth thought he saw. A descendant of Macbeth gave it to me in Scotland several years ago."

Senator Quay smiled. "There is only one dagger I would trade this for, and that is a dagger that used to hang on the wall in Alphonse Karr's study," he said.

"Karr, in one of his stories, had poked a good deal of fun at a woman named Colet. Mme. Colet, enraged at being made a butt of, stabbed Karr. He, on his recovery, hung the dagger she had stabbed him with above his desk, with this inscription beneath it: "'Presented to Alphonse Karr—by Mme. Colet—in the back.'"

MINISTER KNOCKED OUT ELDER

Disgraceful Scandal That Has Disrupted Pennsylvania Church.

Rev. Samuel P. Montgomery of Pittsburg is among the best known United Presbyterian preachers in western Pennsylvania. The reverend gentleman has some mining stock which he tried to unload on members of his flock. Elder Edward P. Heath thought this was unclerical in the extreme and he said so to Mr. Montgomery at a church meeting. The latter, a muscular Christian, promptly knocked the elder down. Mr. Heath jumped up and the two clinched for a moment, but the preacher landed once more and the elder "went down and out," as they say at godless prize fights. Next day Mr. Heath caused the arrest of the pastor, who gave bail. All of which has caused great scandal and commotion among the faithful of the congregation.

How to Rule a Husband.

When the writer was about to marry, the wife of a well-known judge gave her this advice:

"My dear, a woman needs the wisdom of Solomon, the patience of Job and the meekness of a dove to get along with the best man that ever lived. I have my third husband, all good men, but all cranky at times. When they are cranky, keep still; when they fret, hold your tongue, and always remember that it takes two to make a quarrel."

In writing to the dear old lady after some years of experience at the headquarters of an army, where I was surrounded by some thirty-thousand men, I took occasion to say:

"The more I see of men the better I like them; and as to quarreling, you are quite right. I should like to add that your admirable advice might perhaps be supplemented by adding: 'Exercise tact, and spell it large.' Tact will win nine times out of ten where open hostility and aggressiveness fails."

The response was:

"You are right; we are improving with each generation."—National Magazine.

"There is a very popular belief that the small ant cannot stand much cold," said a man who lives uptown, "but the idea is entirely wrong. There may have been a time when the ant could not endure low temperatures, but that time has passed, if it ever existed.

"The fact is that the ant seems to rather like the cold, if I may judge from experience at my own home. They have for some time been in the habit of making the icebox their headquaters. They simply live there. It is the one favorite spot with them. Nor are they the least bit inclined to shun the ice. Up to very recently I had thought that the ant was in the habit of burrowing deep into the ground in order to escape the rigors of the winter. But there is nothing in this old idea. It may be due to the exigencies of the struggle for existence, one of the things necessary in the ceaseless fight for life. But, whatever the cause of it, you can put the ant down as being able to stand more cold than the average human being."—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Gen. Kuroki Half French.

Several French soldiers, survivors of the Chinese expedition of 1856, are responsible for the statement that Gen. Kuroki, who is leading the Japanese forces in Manchuria, is in reality half French. His name, they say, is properly spelled Curique. According to the story of these soldiers, a French officer, Capt. Curique, while serving in China in 1856, married a Japanese girl. A son was born to them, who was given the Japanese name Kuroki, corresponding to the French Curique. This son is Gen. Kuroki. Capt. Curique died last year in France. Until the last he corresponded with his son, who has since become famous.

When I was Ill.

He brought me flowers when I was ill.
And placed them where I saw them blooms;
And all the while they used to fill
With perfume delicate my room.

I was a maiden, young and fair,
And he had culture, rank and wealth;
The flowers, and his kindly care,
Helped lure me back to hope and health.

But now that I am well and strong,
No more he comes—he passes by;
And, tho' I would not do him wrong,
I wish that he had let me die.

Ants Can Stand Extreme Cold.

Weapons of Modern War

The present war has raised, perhaps more acutely than ever before, the question how far it is permissible to go with death-dealing inventions. . . . This recalls to mind the mysterious invention of the great Dundonald, which was so terrible that the British government even in its need and extremity shrank from employing it, and resolved to keep it a profound secret lest somebody should put it to use and literally "stagger humanity." Dundonald, who was as accomplished in chemistry and engineering as he was formidable in conflict, first proposed his device in the early Napoleonic wars, to annihilate the French fleet and fortresses at Toulon. It was considered by a committee composed of the foremost army and navy authorities and including Congreve, the inventor of the rocket. The committee reported that the device would undoubtedly do all that Dundonald claimed, but with a devastating fury that would be inhuman. So the government declined to use it at Toulon or at Flushing. When Dundonald went to South America, the British government exacted of him a pledge that he would not use nor divulge his invention there, a pledge which he kept at cost of forfeiting his pay from South American states. In 1846, when there was fear of war with France, his scheme was again considered by a British committee, which reported that it would infallibly annihilate a hostile fleet, but that the use of it would be inhuman. Twice during the Crimean war it was considered for the reduction of Sebastopol, but though nobody doubted it would do the work effectively, it was rejected on the same grounds as before. So to this day the awful secret remains a secret, hidden away in the confidential archives of the British war office.

Now, it may be that the British government was right, and that Dundonald's invention was too inhumanly destructive to be used. But it seems doubtful if governments will assent to the outlawing of any of the existing enginery of war, or even of some new inventions that may yet be perfected. . . . . It would be absurd to demand that warfare in the twentieth century should be conducted with the weapons of the tenth century. Nor are we sure that it would be well for humanity thus to restrain warfare within primitive limits, even if it could be done. The more terrible the engines of war become, the fewer the wars themselves become, and, strange as it may seem, the less destructive do they become. Hannibal used weapons which would be contemptible by the side of those of the last hundred years, and his army was a mere handful compared with those wielded by Napoleon and Grant and Moltke. Yet no battle of the last century can be compared with Cannae in destructiveness to human life. Had Gettysburg equaled it, proportionately, not a single man of Lee's army would have been left alive. As for Waterloo, its slaughter seems insignificant besides that of the Apulian field. Nor was Cannae singular. The battles and the wars of old were, as a general rule, more numerous and more deadly than those of modern times. The broadsword and the pilum did greater havoc than the rifle and the machine gun. So, in a strange way, do deadly inventions lessen mortality, and so, with a strange literalness, does civilization get forward upon a powder cart.—New York Tribune.

Spy on Each Other

Every nation leads a double life. Even our own honest republic is honeycombed with dark recesses of policy and what is rightly called statecraft. Our president is supplemented by Mr. Hay, and, as well, by John E. Wilkie, our chief of secret service, who wears, quite properly, a dark air of mystery as he goes about the world. We have not invented espionage and I do not know that we have perfected it, but where other spies go our list-footed gentlemen go also, and there is in Washington a tolerably complete knowledge of the doings in the underworld of international politics.

Brussels, however, is the capital of international espionage, whether it be political or diplomatic or military—this by reason of its central position and the neutrality of Belgium. The secret service of France has always been singularly good, as it has need to be. Of recent years, however, the service has been badly dislocated. Both England and Germany have outmaneuvered it time and again.

A few years ago a stranger in Paris might have seen a whole city boiling with patriotism and hissing an alien king in the streets. What interest had the Parisians in crying "A bas le roi Uhlan!" as he of Spain passed? None in the world. The German embassy had, however, at that moment an interest in creating a "diplomatic incident," and so it distributed money to the servile press of Paris, loosed its many agents in the streets, and the organized "manifestation."

This is a single, slight illustration of the utility—the morality is another question—of a secret service which has to do with more than smugglers and coiners and such simple folks. One cannot live for many years in Europe and study what are ironically called "public affairs" without cutting many of these dark trails.

International espionage is a huge and complicated system. That part which has to do with politics is by far the most important. In France, at all events, under the popular tumult of many a noisy election, the wily work of England or Germany has been discovered.

Three years ago I was told by one who was informed that the French government knew and was watching the following foreign agents—274 Germans, eighteen Austrians, seventy-one Italians, eleven Spaniards, seventy Englishmen and thirty-three Russians and Poles, with a fair complement of Americans, Dutch and Swedes. Through so finely a reticulated network of observation hardly the smallest minnow of fact can escape. Nothing takes place in Europe, I believe, no statesman takes snuff, no king sneezes, but is known within twenty-four hours to every state.—Success.

The Sand Man's Town

Come cuddle your head on my breast, little boy,
And cover your drowsy eyes,
And we'll away from the land of day
To the dreamland in the skies.
By the Shut-Eye route we will go, little boy,
As the purpling sun sinks down
And flashes its beams in golden streams
And silvery shafts, to the land of dreams,
That borders the Sand Man's town.

With your dear hands folded in mine, little boy,
We will travel to that land fair,
Where the rose-bloom smiles in the leafy aisles
And the bird song fills the air,
The sleepship waits at the port, little boy,
With its snowy pinions a-gleam,
And its prow points straight for the golden gate,
So let's go aboard or we may be late
For the wonderful land of dream.

Then, away o'er rosy sea, little boy,
By the light of the old north star,
While the sunset dies in the golden skies,
We'll sail for that land afar.
O, list to the gentle splash, little boy,
Of the waves against the strand,
As they swiftly ride o'er the crimson tide,
While peacefully over their crest we glide
Toward the beautiful slumber land!

The silvery moon hangs low, little boy,
When the harbor bar is passed,
To the joyous strain of a sweet refrain,
And we anchor in port at last.
Then the sand man leads us ashore, little boy,
To his beautiful castle there,
In a shady dell, where his minions dwell,
And over the land weave a magic spell
Of enchantment everywhere.

Then, out for a trip we will go, little boy,
Through this wonderful land of dream,
And, side by side, we will take a ride
Down a roadway of chocolate cream.
There are bonbon trees everywhere, little boy,
And an ice cream soda lake,
While the walks are made and the highways laid
With cinnamon drops of a crimson shade,
And curbings of layer cake.

When the first faint flush tints the sky, little boy,
And crimsons the peaceful bay,
The ship's bell rings and the sand man sings:
"All aboard for the land of day!"
Then, out with the flowing tide, little boy,
And over the spray and foam,
While the pale stars gleam and the moon rays beam
With a silvery light on the rippling stream,
Till the harbor bells rings "Home!"

Logic of the Savage

Lord Lyveden and his party of English tourists were recently entertained in New York. Lord Lyveden, who has traveled all over the world, narrated at a dinner some of his adventures. At one point he said:

"I used to know in Australia an intelligent and interesting missionary. He and I were talking one day about the natives of New Guinea, and he told me how one of these natives had stumped him in a certain argument.

"It seems that he had accosted the native, and urged him to let himself be civilized.

"'But what good,' the native asked, 'will this civilization of yours do me?'

"'Well,' said the missionary, 'you will cease, for one thing, to idle all your time away. You will learn the delights of honest labor.'

"'What good will the labor do me?'

"'Through it you will gradually accumulate money, and in time, with frugality, you will possess much store of honestly acquired riches.'

"The native was still unconvinced. 'What good will the riches do me?' was his next question.

"'They,' said the missionary, 'will enable you to cease from work at last, and to spend the rest of your days in well-earned rest.'

"The native laughed.

"'It seems to me,' he said, 'that, if I did as you say, I would be taking a mighty roundabout course to get to the place I started from.'"

All candidates, whether successful or not, must file an itemized account of what money they spent in the canvass with the judge of probate within thirty days from the primary. Don't forget.

AN ERROR.

Through an error on the part of the printer W. H. Conway's vote for commissioner at Beat 4 box was printed 17. It should have read 117. Brother Conway expresses great pleasure with the large vote he received on the 26th.

ILLEGAL VOTING.

In an article about the votes in the people's primary the Banner says, "It is said a considerable quantity were disqualified." We don't know of a disqualified voter on July 26, but we do know that on April 11 a large proportion of the vote cast was disqualified by the laws of Alabama, at least nine of their appointed officers on that occasion being disqualified, let alone the rank and file.

COME DOWN TO FACTS.

The banner takes exception to an article clipped from the Yellow Jacket, of Moravian Falls, N. C., and reproduced in The Union by request of some of our subscribers who are tired of the democratic howl about "the nigger" and wish to show up the standing of the "demmies" on that point. As usual, instead of answering the argument advanced, the Banner strikes off on a side issue, this time trying to hide behind a woman's skirts. No man, except one with a besotted, vile mind, would draw such inferences from any paragraph in that letter. We allow none to exceed us in the respect and deference due to all good women. They are the "salt of the earth." Let the Banner try to controvert the facts as set forth in that "catechism." Come out in the open.

TO THE VOTERS OF CHILTON COUNTY.

The nominations for the several offices are made and I am sure the ticket will be unanimously elected in November. While I was defeated, I don't think any the less of the party or ticket than if I'd been nominated, and will do what I can for the ticket. I'm not a democrat just because I'm defeated, but am just as strong for the party as ever, if some do seem to inherit office. I can't afford to go back on the people, but will be with them unto the end, for I think they are right. I've given more time to the public in the last 12 years than almost any man in the county, and have got as much for it as anyone. Office is a gift in the hands of the people, that they are compelled to give someone, and for that reason and by the request of some good men, I asked for the nomination, but they saw fit to give it to another by a small majority and I cheerfully submit, wishing the ticket success. I've had the pleasure of knowing that I received the support of some of the best men in the county. Now I hope you will all understand this letter and that I am yet with the people and will be as long as we have a ticket. Again thanking my friends, I am yours as ever,

JOSEPH H. THOMAS.

POPULAR SCIENCE

As the pearl fisheries at Lohia, the lower end of the Red Sea, are financed by natives of India (the divers being all Arabs), it is difficult to get the yearly output of the pearls or their correct value; but the trade returns for 1903 show that $77,077 worth were exported for that year.

Iceland is so commonly believed to be a barren glacier-covered land like Greenland that it comes as a gentle shock to read of a grant of $25,000 annually made by the Icelandic Parliament for the granting of "loans to purchase galvanized barbed wire for fencing farms."

An information bureau has recently been inaugurated in connection with the University of Paris, and is considered an excellent innovation. The bureau will afford information on all matters connected with higher education in Paris, whether in Government or private institutions. Those who, in this country or elsewhere, are contemplating entering a university, and who have spent hours in trying to derive some tangible ideas from calendars and class syllabuses, will appreciate the useful purpose which would be served by a bureau of this character.

An English naturalist has discovered a new and interesting species of spider in Australia. It lives in the crevices of the rocks along the seashore between high-water and low-water marks, selecting this peculiar situation, it is believed, because it finds there the food that it likes best. Of course, its home is submerged when the tide is in, but it prevents the water from coming in by weaving a sheet of silk across the entrance. The web is air-tight, as well as water-tight, but enough air is inclosed when the web is stretched to last the spider until the tide recedes.

The text-books have put down carbon as an element that could not be melted. Dr. Ludwig has succeeded not only in melting it but in keeping it in the fused condition long enough to study it somewhat. The melting was produced by subjecting the carbon to a pressure of 22,500 pounds to the square inch while at the same time it was heated to the highest point obtainable in the electric furnace. The carbon in the liquid form is transparent. On being suddenly cooled a gray powder is produced in which there are myriads of microscopic diamonds formed by the crystallization.

Satisfaction in Work.

President Charles W. Eliot in the World's Work says that any occupation that combines avoidable risks with uncertain productiveness has in it two large elements of interest, and, therefore, of possible satisfaction. Thus, the miner's occupation, in which it is uncertain how much coal or ore a given expenditure of labor in drilling and blasting will produce, has these two elements of satisfaction. Every trading operation has in it the interest of adventure. Finally, those occupations which, like the building trades, present from day to day, or from year to year, new materials, processes, designs and products—and, in these days, what occupation does not offer many elements of novelty—give to the life of the workman the interest of variety, with new things always to learn. The higher employments all offer a large variety from year to year, and even from week to week; but the lower employments, too, offer to ambitious and alert workmen a large variety of mental and bodily occupation. A middle aged printer lately said to a friend of mine, "I have been thirty-five years in a printing office, and still I learn something new about printing every day." Indeed, it has been a characteristic of the last thirty years that all the main industries have been made over, root and branch.

The following persons and no others, who, if their place of residence shall remain unchanged, will have, at the date of the next general election, the qualifications as to residence prescribed by section 1 of this act, shall be qualified to register as electors, provided they shall not be disqualified under section 2 of this act:

1st. Those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who are physically unable to work; and those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who have worked or been regularly engaged in some lawful employment, business or occupation, trade or calling for the greater part of the twelve months next preceding the time they offer to register, and those who are unable to read and write, if such inability is due solely to physical disability; or,

2d. The owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of forty acres of land situate in this state, upon which they reside; or the owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of any woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of real estate situate in this state, assessed for taxation at the value of three hundred dollars or more or the owner in good faith, in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith, in her own right, of personal property in this state assessed for taxation for three hundred dollars or more; provided, that the taxes due upon such real or personal property for the year next preceding the year in which he offers to register shall have been paid, unless the assessment shall have been legally contested and is undetermined.

Sec. 15. Any elector who registered prior to January 1, 1903, who has changed the county of his residence shall be registered on application on production of his certificate, unless he has since become disqualified.

Sec. 16. When the certificate of any elector who was duly registered has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, on application stating that the certificate has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, and verified by affidavit, and it appears of record that such applicant has been registered, the judge of probate of the county of registration or the secretary of state shall issue to the applicant a certificate that he was duly registered as an elector Such certificate shall be issued free of charge to the elector. The secretary of state shall at the expense of the state furnish the judge of probate blank certificates for use as provided in this section.

The certificate of the registrars or the judge of probate or of the secretary of state shall be sufficient to establish the fact of such registration.

Be sure and register when the registrars are in your beat, as the only excuse for not doing so is by reason of sickness of yourself or in your family, or by absence from the county. Everybody can register this summer who will be qualified by residence or age by the 8th day of November. Poll tax paying has nothing to do with registration; you can register now and pay your poll tax afterwards, but you can not vote unless you are both registered and have paid your poll tax (if any is due). The period of residence necessary to register is two years in the state, one year in the county, and three months in the beat. If you have moved from one beat to another in the county less than three months before election day, you can vote in your old beat, so you don't lose your vote by changing beats. Any one who desires to register on property qualification should take with him his last assessment sheet and tax collector's receipt to show to the registrars as proof that you are possessed of such property, and pay taxes on it. You can register under ANY of the following heads:

1. If you own 40 acres or more land in this state, and reside upon it.

2. If your wife owns 40 acres or more land in this state, upon which you reside.

3. If you own real estate in this state that is assessed for taxation at $300 or more.

4. If your wife owns real estate in this state assessed for taxation at $300 or more.

5. If you own personal property in this state assessed for taxation for $300 or more.

6. If your wife owns personal property in this state assessed for taxation for $300 or more.

7. If you can read and write any section of the constitution of the United States.

Don't give up your life certificate that you got in 1902; you only have to show it to the registrars in case you have moved to this county from some other county.

THE UNION will furnish any one information on any special points that they may be in doubt upon, and stands ready to help any one to get all the rights he is entitled to under the laws of Alabama. If you think you are entitled to register and the registrars should refuse you, take a couple of good men with you so you can have witnesses as to such refusal and the reasons given by the registrars, and thereby be enabled to take your case up to higher authority. tf

How to Live to 100.

Senator Wark, of Canada.

I FIND that the information usually sought from me is as to food and habits of life, that may show why my life has extended beyond the usual span. As to food, I have been accustomed to eat oatmeal porridge and milk fromm my childhood and I still use it for the principal part of my breakfast, with a single cup of black tea and a slice of plain bread after it. I consider it both wholesome and nutritious. Till quite late in life I ate butchers' meat. I did not care how fat, but the fat began to disagree with me, and I have made it a rule to eat nothing that disagrees with my digestion no matter how palatable. I have, therefore, for many years, eaten no beef or mutton or pork in any form. I take instead a little fowl or fish, my cup of tea at mid-day for dinner, and at six o'clock I find a cup of tea and a slice of bread is all that I need. My cup of tea is my only dessert. I eat no pie or pudding, drink nothing stronger than tea, eat no suppers, go to bed at or before ten o'clock and rise these dark mornings about half past seven.

I now ask my young readers to open their Bibles at the 25th chapter of Matthew, and read from the 31st verse to the end, and learn that, whether life is long or short, the important point is to be prepared for its end.

Editor Union:

Please allow me space for a few lines to the public. In the first place, I want to thank my friends who voted for me in the primary. I am as thankful to them as if I had got the nomination. Now a few words to the defeated candidates. I hear that some of them are a little dissatisfied. If there is any of them that are not satisfied they have gone back on their word, for every one of them said if they weren't the choice they were to submit to the will of the people and would support the nominees; and any one who ran in the primary and was defeated and will not support the man that got the nomination over him is not true to his party, and ought to go to the dems., for he is only after an office and is caring nothing for the party. Some of the demmies say that Hubbard will get beat, but I'll never believe it till it is done. Now, boys, let every fellow do his best, and we'll roll up the largest majority Noember 8 that we've ever known in this county, and then see what the democrats will say. Yours truly,

W. F. DESHAZO.

Editor Union:

Will you please allow me space in your paper to express my gratitude and appreciation to the people of Chilton county for nominating me again as their candidate for county superintendent of education. No one could be more grateful than I am for this expression of the people, which shows that they are satisfied with my administration of the affairs pertaining to this office; and I promise that when I am elected in November, I will use my best efforts to keep the educational growth for Chilton county in pace with that of the best counties in the state. I promise a consecrated service to the duties of this honorable and responsible position, and shall do what I can in assisting the newly elected district trustees, in a preparation for their duties. Again thanking the people for placing me among the nominees and pledging my support and influence in an honest and honorable way for the success of our ticket.

I am very truly,

J. W. MOORE, County Supt.

THE NATIONAL GAME.

Parent, of the Boston Americans, still keeps up his heavy stick work.

The Boston National team has no batter among the first eighteen men.

Strang is back again in the game for Brooklyn, after a lay-off since May 27.

Baseball has had enough of the enervating and paralyzing foul-strike rule.

Lajoie says that Plank is about as dangerous a left-hander as he cares to face.

Kelley, of Cincinnati, says he has never seen Odwell's superior as an outfielder.

Altrock is getting to be the champion shut-out pitcher of the American League.

When it comes to first baseman, McGann, of New York, leaves all others in the rear.

The Chicago National League Club has purchased Shortstop Hoffman from Des Moines.

Napoleon Lajoie is the best drawing card in baseball, Wagner and Waddell coming next.

Dobbs is fielding brilliantly for Brooklyn this season. But his throwing arm has not gained strength.

Harry Bay, of Cleveland, may be matched for a 100 yards dash against the National's fastest man, George Browne.

Shortstop Corcoran, of Cincinnati, in the game of July 17 had but one chance, a pop fly, in the ninth inning. This is remarkable.

The Boston Herald briefly but portentiously remarks: "There'll be no foul-strike in the American League games next season. Stick a pin in this prediction."

So far this season in the various minor leagues there have been half a dozen no-hit games. These pitching feats are almost invariably acclaimed as "equal to Cy Young's great feat."

LABOR WORLD.

Vicksburg (Miss.) carpenters are on a strike.

The Commercial Telegraphers' Union now reports 10,000 members.

Boston (Mass.) coal trimmers and heavers have formed a union.

Paris (France) dockers have gone on strike for higher wages and shorter hours of labor.

During the past three months sixty-three new local unions have been established by the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners.

Last year 2929 railroad men were killed in the United States and 50,524 were injured. The figures for all coal mines for 1903 show 1467 killed and 3643 injured.

The politicians of Kansas City, Mo., have entered into the "open shop" campaign. A vote has been passed repealing the union label law regarding public printing.

The aggregate wealth of the United Mine Workers is not publicly known, but it is safe to assert that it is the wealthiest as well as the greatest labor union in the world.

Union printers in the district surrounding Chicago, Ill., have started a movement for the establishment of the eight-hour day for their craft throughout the United States.

Detroit (Mich.) painters have returned to work, having gained a minimum wage of thirty-three cents an hour and an eight-hour day. The demand for a closed shop was waived.

The United States employed 10,555 men in distributing mail last year. The cost was $63,594,000. In 373 accidents to mail cars eighteen clerks were killed and seventy-eight seriously injured.

WORDS OF PRAISE FOR WORLD'S FAIR

PROMINENT VISITORS DECLARE IT SURPASSES ALL EXPECTATIONS

The Opinion is Unanimous That No Other Exposition Ever Equalled the One at St. Louis, and Attendance is Both a Duty and a Privilege.

St. Louis.—During the past few weeks a great many men prominent in the various walks of life, but particularly in political fields, have visited St. Louis and the Exposition. The comments of some of them, showing a unanimous opinion of the surpassing greatness and beauty of the Fair, are given below:

Governor Benjamin B. Odell says St. Louis is no warmer than New York City. In answer to a query as to what he thought of the Fair, the Governor said:

"Two things strike me particularly concerning the St. Louis Exposition. In the first place the magnitude and the beauty of the whole enterprise impress themselves upon the visitor from the beginning of his stay. In the second place, I find that St. Louis has been badly misrepresented by accounts which say that her weather is unbearable. On the contrary, I find that St. Louis is a comparatively cool place as compared with New York City. I dare say from what I hear that St. Louis will be no warmer during July and August than New York or Chicago. The Fair is wonderful. I believe the people are not going to miss such a wonderful exhibition as is to be found in St. Louis. I think the attendance will be particularly large in the fall. I find that St. Louis is again misrepresented when it is said that the city is not prepared to receive visitors to the Exposition. The city seems to be amply supplied with hotels which will satisfy people of every degree of wealth. Then there are the numerous beautiful homes for which St. Louis is noted, all of which seem to be thrown open to the visitor. I shall not go into detail in regard to my views of the different exhibits; suffice it to say that they are all wonderful in their completeness and in their beauty. The whole Fair is worthy of being seen by every New Yorker. A glorious time awaits those who see the Exposition."

Hon. John Sharp Williams, of Mississippi, Democratic leader in the House of Representatives, and temporary Chairman of the Democratic National convention: "The Louisiana Purchase Exposition is, by far, the most wonderful thing of its kind and as an educator it cannot be excelled. No one should fail to see the Exposition, as it can not be appreciated by merely reading about it."

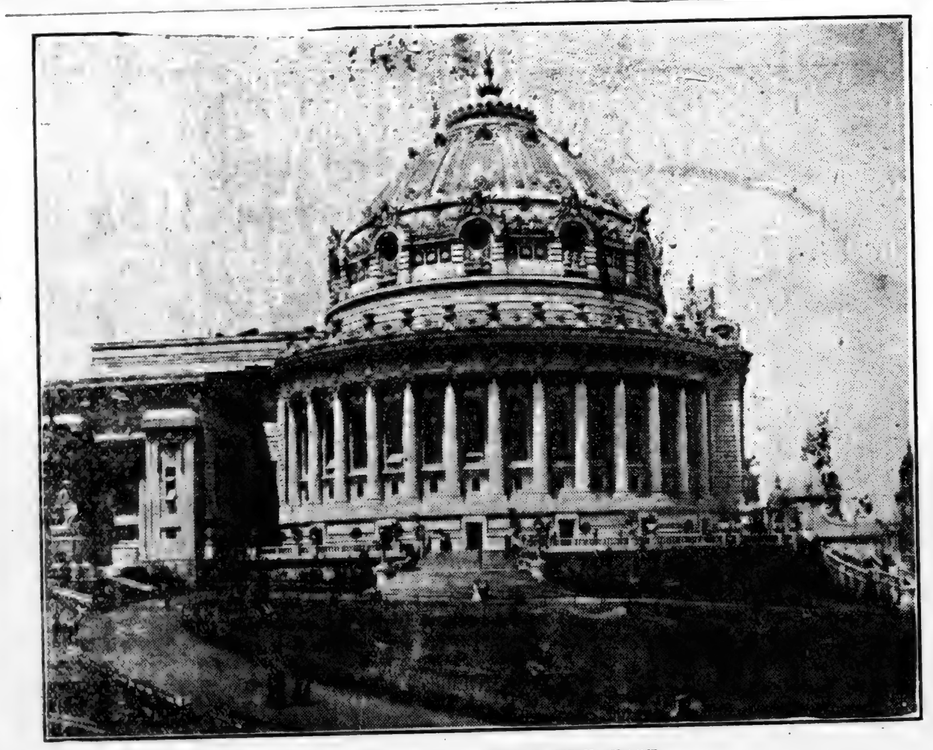
Governor Richard Yates, of Illinois: "The more I see of the Exposition the more I enjoy it. It is by all means the greatest World's Fair I have ever seen. As an opportunity for becoming acquainted with the resources of the country, for acquiring a general knowledge of every subject that I can think of, a visit to the Fair should not be missed. It is also an excellent means for having a good time. The amusement features are fine. St. Louis seems well prepared to take care of her guests. The city and the management of the Exposition in particular are to be congratulated for what they have accomplished. The Fair is beautiful and should be seen by all."

Hoke Smith, of Atlanta, Ga., Secretary of the Interior under President Cleveland: "I am highly pleased with the Exposition, and believe it to be one of the triumphs of modern civilization. The Fair is certainly better than all others I have seen, and it is indeed quite an education to see the Exposition. The kind of weather that St. Louis seems to have in store for her guests is quite an agreeable surprise. St. Louis is a beautiful city and seems to be caring for her guests in a most admirable manner. The Fair is wonderful and should not be missed by any one who has the slightest opportunity of seeing it."

Judge D. T. Marvel, of Wilmington, Del.: "One of the best things, in my opinion, that can be said of the Fair is the fact that it is so arranged that although hundreds of thousands may be in the grounds there is no crowding and no discomfort. The magnitude of the Fair is wonderful. The exhibits are beautiful; they represent all the interests of all countries. A thorough examination of them will impart more knowledge than could be obtained in many months at a university or a college. The grounds, the buildings, the style of architecture, the landscape work, all combine to make the Exposition the prettiest thing I have ever seen. The illumination at night is a wonderful sight. I hope that every one who has the opportunity will see the Fair."

Mr. Chas. M. Keezel, of Harrisonburg, Va., a delegate to the National Republican convention: "The Exposition surpasses the expectations of every one. One can have a glorious time in St. Louis at most reasonable expense. The Fair is beyond description. It is particularly beautiful at night, when it is illuminated with millions of electric lights. To see the Fair at such a time is a sight not soon to be forgotten. No Virginian should miss this opportunity of seeing the Exposition—the grandest ever produced."

Mr. William Barnes, Jr., of Albany, N. Y., Republican State Committeeman for the State of New York: "You can say for me that this Fair has surpassed my fondest expectations. It is wondertul. For magnitude, beauty, completeness and arrangement it could not be excelled. The architecture, massive and picturesque, of the different buildings, is a treat for the eye. The Pike attractions have not been commented upon enough. Many of the attractions on the Pike are far more educational and instructive than many of the exhibits to be found in the Varied Industries building, for instance. Others could not be equalled from a point of view of entertainment. St. Louis seems to be well prepared to handle crowds. The people of New York will miss an opportunity if they do not see this wonderful Fair. However, they are not going to miss it. They are already here in large numbers and will come in even greater numbers as the season advances. No American should miss this Exposition."



FESTIVAL HALL FROM THE EAST.

HINDUS AS FIGHTERS.

Native-Born Fighters of India — Their Habits.

A native officer of India writes of the native soldiers: "The Sikhs, or reformed Hindus, have all the qualities of the best fighters, and the Indians as well as their fellow subjects in Europe have indeed reason to be proud of them. There are two other castes in Punjab also noted for their fighting qualities, the Jats and the Dagras.

"Another great fighting race in Punjab inhabiting the northwestern part are commonly known as the Pathans. They are now Mohammedans by faith. The Gurkhas of Nepal, the only independent State in India, though generally below average height, have proved themselves the most indomitable, brave and hardy hill fighters. European officers attached to Gurkhas regiments love their men and are proud of them. Their free and easy manners, abstemious habits, cheerful disposition, bravery in the field of war or of sport help to raise them in the estimation of all who come in contact with them. They are of Hindu origin."

Some Nominations.

Party nominations for Vice-President have been declined a number of times. In the Democratic National Convention of 1844 Silas Wright, of New York, was nominated for Vice-President on the first ballot, receiving 256 of the 266 votes. He declined to accept, and George M. Dallas, of Pennsylvania, was nominated on the ticket with James K. Polk. The Democratic ticket was successful in the election. The nomination for second place on a national ticket by third parties has been several times declined.

THEY WERE HAPPY.

An Amusing Conversation Overheard in a Public Park.

An amusing example of the blending of the sentimental and the practical was overheard at Olentangy Park the other day. Two people greatly interested in each other occupied the boat.

The man was leaning forward, with his heart in his eyes, and was overheard by two people on the bank to say to the girl, who rowed:

"Darling, you are the very sweetest person in the world, and I can never tell you—pull on the left oar there, you're going to run into the bank. There isn't any one in the whole world to compare with you, and never will be—the right oar, dear, pull hard, quick. You know as well as I do that we are made for one another, and—quick, the right oar, or you'll run into that tree. You are positively the sweetest—both oars, and hard on the left, darling. Just the dearest girl to sit there and row me so that I can look at you—look out there, dear——"

All this to the delight of the listeners on the bank who never intended playing eavesdroppers.—Columbus (O.) Dispatch.

Pure Food.

It is to be hoped that the movement springing up in the East in the interests of pure food will travel across the continent to the West, even to California, and that the people will manifest their anxiety to have their flavorings and canned meats and fruits pure and wholesome by holding up the hands of those who may undertake to organize a crusade against the adulterators. There is not a city in California where doubtful adulterations are not used in one way or another.—San Jose Mercury.

AN OLD SMOKER'S DREAM.

How He "Swore Off," Yet Enjoyed His Weed.

"It has been eighteen years since I was told to break loose from tobacco, as over-indulgence in smoking was about to knock me out," said S. J. Manson, of Chicago. "From that day, though so dear a lover of the weed, I haven't put a cigar or pipe between my lips, and yet, strange as it may sound, on numerous occasions I find myself puffing out huge clouds of smoke drawn from the most fragrant Havanas that ever were given to solace mankind.

"These smokes, let it be understood, come in my dreams, but the enjoyment they confer is as solid and substantial as in the old days, when the indulgence was a reality. Curiously enough, too, the visions always present a group of friends. I can see them puffing away vigorously. I catch the aroma they blow forth; I hear their conversation as in the old days, and the whole atmosphere is of tobacco. Yet, despite these vivid pictures, awakening brings no desire to resume the ancient habit, and so I expect to continue dreaming of smoking to the end of the chapter."

Grew So Fast He Died.

Physicians regard the case of Walter J. Ricks, a youth who died at the home of his parents in Lafayette, Ind., from the effects of too rapid growth, as one of the most remarkable in medical annals. Although but fourteen years old, young Ricks was over six feet in height, but slender. The development of his internal organs did not keep pace with that of his body and his limbs, and the strain on his heart resulted in injury to the vital organ and caused his death.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

A SERMON FOR SUNDAY

AN ELOQUENT DISCOURSE BY THE REV. A. B. KINSOLVING.

Subject: "The Debt to Caesar and to God"—We Must Not Permit the "Huge Mundane Machine" to Run Over Our Souls.

SOUTHAMPTON, L. I.—Dr. A. B. Kinsolving, rector of Christ Church, Clinton street, Brooklyn, preached here Sunday morning in St. Andrew's Dune Church. His subject was "Our Debt to Caesar and Our Debt to God." His text was chosen from St. Matthew xxii:21: "Render therefore unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's; and unto God the things which are God's." Dr. Kinsolving said:

Were ever words more palpably just and fair? Could any statement be more calmly self-evidencing? Could any disentanglement of the provinces of God and Caesar be more distinct, or any declaration of our respective duty be more lucid? Men have always been confusing these two things—their debt to Caesar and their debt to God—mixing up in some clumsy fashion the one with the other, fancying that when they have discharged one they have done the other also, finding the one to conflict with the other through some misunderstanding of the dignity and weight of the respective obligations.

And not only in private life, but in the history of peoples and States what confusion, what blundering has there been! Look how the cruel Roman empire tried through years to crush out the life of the Christian martyrs for simply doing their duty to God, and then in turn, when the empire had been conquered by the church and the papacy was seated upon its throne and had erected its palatial Vatican amid the ruins of the old order, see how the haughty earthly embodiment of the heavenly autocracy sought to bring low and make subservient the things of Caesar! You are familiar, doubtless, with the way the saying was brought about. A party of young Pharisees—the old hacks had recently retired in confusion—had joined with some Herodians or Jewish nationalists to put to Jesus a catch question to ensnare Him. "Master," said they with feigned earnestness, "we know that Thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth, neither carest Thou for any man, for Thou regardest not the person of men. Tell us, therefore: What thinkest Thou? Is it lawful to pay this distasteful Roman poll tax or no?"

If He had answered "Yes" He would have been at once discredited as the Messiah—King of Israel. If "no" it would have been treason and rebellion against Rome. So instead of falling into the trap set for Him, with a complete, a divine grasp of the whole situation, He declares a principle which is the key to this whole complexity in life wherever it may possibly occur. "Why tempst Me, ye hypocrites? Show Me the tribute money. Whose image is this stamped on your current coin? Caesar's. Very well. Then what is Caesar's give back to Caesar, and what is God's to God."

The impression it produced at the moment was profound. "When they had heard these words they marveled and left Him and went their way." He had lifted the whole controversy out of the immediate and passing circumstances into the region of largest and widest statesmanship, and all the centuries of human history that have rolled by since have not exhausted its wisdom.

"Render therefore unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's." Not a great deal of time, I take it, needs to be spent in enforcing this behest. It marks the sanity, the wholesomeness of Christ's religion. It is no star-gazing cult. The charge against it of inveterate other worldliness is a libel. Christianity has always taught man to do nobly, patiently, heroically his full duty to the State, to rulers, to society. We are part of a social system which has already taken shape. We are in debt to it in many ways. "We pass its coins freely; we enjoy its endowments." Its image and superscription are on us: We belong of right to our age; our era of civilization, our nation, State, city, community. All that is around us is but the providential setting and environment of our lives. It is never perfect. There is, and for a great while to come is likely to be a vast deal that is faulty about it. But we have no charter from Christ to be hopelessly sour in our attributes toward it. We are to trust, you and I, the upward growth, the slow and painful evolution of human civilization. We are to believe that at the heart of the movement there are deep-hidden, interior principles which, in co-operation with those special and powerful incentives which God brings to bear from above, are steadily bringing the kingdom of Caesar to some better fulfillment of itself. So then, even when we see things in the nation, the municipality, the neighborhood, go wrong; even when we see tyranny and corruption and abuses, we are not permitted to turn away in despair and disgust. We have no right to stand aloof as if our hands would be contaminated by any contact with it. Our duty is to go bravely in and try to discharge our duty to the civil and secular powers, respecting the moral worth of the things of Caesar, and confidently trusting truth and God and humanity for the dawning of the brighter day. We are set as Christians not to build a dazzling visible church of God upon the ruins of the dynasties and governments of earth, as was dreamed by the medieval popes and doctors. No, but rather is our book to infuse into organized human society the healthful spirit of the kingdom of Jesus Christ, and meanwhile, as Christ's words here clearly teach us, to keep the two spheres distinct.

And on the same principle precisely I think our Lord would have us deal with entire honesty with the facts of science. To presume to use religious authority to deny the ascertained and verified conclusions of a genuine science—as was done, for instance, in the case of Galileo, and has often been urged since, is to break Christ's command. Natural science must proceed along its own distinct and separate lines. It cannot go out of its sphere to teach the world religion. Its function is to search out and interpret material facts. But in its own proper sphere we must respect it. We owe it the tribute of our sincerity. We must render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and there will be no sort of peril to us if we are at pains at the same time to "render to God the things that are God's."

But is it in the point that I have been urging that most men fail nowadays? Is it here that we need to throw our emphasis on this "Render to Caesar?" Are there not certain forces in the realm of Caesar which of themselves exact the payment of what is due there? Does not this tribute get itself paid in as do the State taxes by a sort of self-acting process, so that in a rough way it has to be forthcoming? Is not the real trouble now that we are in so many cases surrendering to Caesar more and more of the things which belong to God?

"It towers over us," some one has said, "this world movement of modern civilization, with its immense volume and weight of human interests, human growths, human skill and art and industry. It makes itself more and more felt as the one overpowering, ruling fact. It fills the scene. Where is there any room for the things of God? Where can the spirit move and breathe? Where has the soul fled?" Because of the pressure upon their lives of the world of Caesar, because of the strong currents that sweep them along, soul and body, our debts to God too often go unpaid.

You know how it is without my attempting to describe it in detail. Industry, with its iron necessities, grips a man; he flings himself with good American pluck and purpose into the thing before him, and by and by the very headway of success, the very stress of competition, is found to be using up all his strength. Soon his prayers get thinner and poorer; he has scarce time for them and feels less and less need for them. When his days and nights at the office are through with, he recuperates his tired energies at the club, where he can still with the waning nerve power talk over the course of the market—or else he goes out of town to get the relaxation which will enable him to keep his place in Caesar's kingdom.

He does not mean at first to renounce his obligation to God. For some time he pays it in the worthless currency of good intentions and good-humored apologies. By and by even these are omitted, and he and his friends begin to justify the dereliction to God on the score of the increasing claims of Caesar. This laxity on the part of men and women to-day is giving back to God the things that are God's is simply appalling in view of God's unrivalled gifts and blessings to us. If it be true that "to whom much is given of him shall much be required," and that judgment will ever begin at the house of God with the privileged, what is to be said when we all stand, as stand we shall, before the Son of Man? "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." Christ Jesus does not block the way of our paying our just debt to Caesar, but He does warn us with the utmost plainness not to give Caesar everything.

If we allow "the huge mundane machine" to run over our souls, like some car of Juggernaut, crushing out our religious freedom and initiative, we shall be horribly flattened in our manhood, our sympathies, our ideals, our conceptions of life. The results may not appear fully for a while, but in the end there will be experienced an impoverishment, an atrophy, a sinister, maimed and crippled growth which will make us unfit for our citizenship in the higher kingdom here or there. St. Paul, in beginning his Epistle to the Romans—that is, to the people who then lived at the capital city of Caesar's realm—accounts in the following words for the sin and misery, the failure and decadence of heathendom: He tells them that "when they knew God, they glorified Him not as God, neither were thankful. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools. They changed His truth into a lie, and worshiped and served the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed forever." It was an awful blunder. No greater could be made by any man or people. They made the world they lived in their god, their only god, and worshiped and served it with their whole hearts. They worshiped power, knowledge, pleasure, wealth, force, passion, art. They lived for these things until they fancied that these were the only things to live for. We know the result. As they rejected Him, so God rejected them. As a punishment He gave them over to moral corruption, to an abandoned mind, to a festering decadence. "And men crowded around and strove for place and food, and the strong beat down the weak, and the rich were gorged and the poor were sent empty away, and strife and cruelty filled the earth with violence." That was happening at the very moment Christ spoke these tremendous words: "Render to God the things which are God's." This is the sort of heathenism which exists everywhere on this earth where it is not persistently kept down by the spirit of Jesus Christ. "To God the things that are God's!" "To God the things that are God's!" Let that cry haunt you until it compels you to pay your debt. Have the courage to look on the one hand at what you are giving to the world represented by Caesar, and on the other at what you are actually giving to God. Is God missing His rights? Is your duty to Him threatened by the power and pomp of this massive earth? Ah! then be all the more careful that your debt to heaven is paid. By the blood of the Crucified, give back to God what really belongs to Him! Your soul, your heart, your convictions, your spiritual reality, your eternal being—all these to God, for they are His. Believe Him when He tells you that all else that we see and handle is but a shadow that passeth away. Aye, trust Him when He pledges you His help whenever you sincerely want to follow Him, and promises never to leave you to struggle on by yourself. Through Him who condescended to make His home in our hearts, who by His spirit "helpeth our infirmities," let us make such offering to God as yet we can. Give God, through Jesus Christ, your Saviour, first of all yourself. He will accept nothing in the stead of you. Do not clutch the portion of goods that falleth to you and try to have them all to yourself in some far country, where you shall never hear the Father's voice or see His face; but whatever you do have from Him, whether more or less, try to enjoy it as a child in your Father's house, under the constant benediction of His smile. In the face of this tremendous pressure of earth, which bears down so heavily upon every soul, resolve manfully that you will not yield; that the great and first commandment of Christ, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God,' shall be kept. "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's."

A religion that stays in the clouds is of no use to anybody. Religion must be definite, practical, useful—a binding rule of daily life—or else it is as much a mockery as the gilded prayer wheel of the Buddhist.—Philadelphia Young People.

The Power of a True Life.

What I wanted, and what I have been endeavoring to ask for the poor African, has been the good offices of Christians, ever since Livingstone taught me during those four months I was with him. In 1878 I went to him as prejudiced as the bitterest atheist in London. I was there away from a worldly world. I saw this solitary old man there, and asked myself, "Why on earth does he stop here?"

For months after we met, I found myself listening to him and wondering at the old man and carrying out all that was said in the Bible. Little by little his sympathies for others became contagious. Mine was aroused. Seeing his piety, his gentleness, his zeal, his earnestness, and how quietly he went about his business, I was converted by him, although he had not tried to do it.—Henry M. Stanley.

The Need of God.

The thought of God, the sense of an immediate relation of the spirit of man to the Eternal and the Infinite, are easily displaced from men's minds by undue admiration for the achievements of a culture based on material progress, and supplying every need of human nature except the very deepest—the need of God.—J. Skinner.

When Small Things Become Great.

The smallest things become great when God requires them of us; they are small when they are done for God, and when they serve to unite us with Him eternally. —Fenelon.

MOST STRIKING THING ABOUT THEM IS THE WAY THEY WALK.

The Korean Dude Is Said to Be Quite a Superior Article—Is Called "Yang Ban," or Noble, and He Oppresses the Common People Woefully.

Although months ago, it seems only yesterday that whenever I had half an hour to spare in Seoul I used to sit in a shop and watch the crowds [illegible] street, just inside the gate. A few small purchases had brought me the eternal friendship of the shopman, who always had a long pipe [illegible] for me, longer than my arm, so that it always had to light it. The [illegible] as seen in everyday life interested me more in a strange country than places or show places. If I had my choice, I would prefer to see a country a "Baedeker" sight or a [illegible] city.

My friend was a seller [illegible] sizes of all sizes but of one shape, that shape I [illegible] the shelves around [illegible] ranged outside the [illegible] no fuss or bustle [illegible] or importuning [illegible] could sit calmly with [illegible] under him on the [illegible] off the ground, smoking [illegible] pipes and wrapped [illegible] and his voluminous white garments. The laundering of his other [illegible] or suits, appeared to [illegible] in progress, as could be heard by the whack-whack of the [illegible] a roller, which [illegible] on the back of the [illegible] his wife was at work at the [illegible] method of ironing, by which the indispensable satin-like [illegible] given the surface.

It was a quaint and interesting procession that passed outside. The Koreans are distinctly a handsome race. They are not in the least like either of their neighbors, the Chinese or the Japanese. Although they have the oblique eyes of the Mongolian, their eyes are, as a rule, straight, or slightly aquiline, their foreheads high and their oval faces clear-cut and individual. The majority of a Chinese crowd look to me always as if their heads had been cast in bullet molds, while this is quite otherwise with the Koreans. The most striking thing about the Korean is the way he walks. He carries himself better than the man of any place I know. There is practically nothing to indicate to a stranger the difference of rank, but as you watch a Yang-ban coming along the street there is a slight swing, redolent of immense superiority, that points out the patrician to the most casual onlooker. Some of them look as if they were always balancing up the center of a palace chamber to the dais, amid admiring [illegible]. It is not swagger, but a very [illegible], superlative self-consciousness of their own worth of position. The [illegible] "Yangban," or noble, is a delicious study. No London, Paris or New York swell, flaneur or dude is in it with him. His white suit is spotless [illegible] there is not a hair straying from his "Mang-Kun," a crownless skull of horsehair gauze coming well down over his forehead and fastened tightly as to produce a permanent curve in his skin and frequent headache, to be borne for the sake of fashion. On this his hat, also of horsehair, is poised and tied under his chin, with black ribbons. If he has brown hair, it has been darkened with lampblack to the fashionable shade. He is invariably attended by a servant, he does nothing for himself; not even light a pipe; even going to school their books are carried for them. When he goes he is attended by as many servants as he can possibly muster. When he rides, he does not even hold the reins of his diminutive horse. INTERNATIONAL LESSON COMMENT FOR AUGUST 14.

Subject: Obadiah and Elijah, I Kin. xviii., 1-16—Golden Text, I Kings xviii., 12—Memory Verses, 5, 6—Commentary on the Day's Lesson.

I. Elijah goes to meet Ahab (vs. 1, 2). 1. "Many days." The waiting time may have seemed long to Elijah. "The third year." It is supposed that he dwelt by the Cherith about a year and at Zarephath two years and six months. It is now in the third year since he went to Zarephath. "Go." Elijah made no move only as he had directions from God. The time had come when the people were in a state of mind to receive the benefit God intended them to receive through the terrible calamity that had come upon them. "Unto Ahab." The King had remained obdurate and unreformed. Another opportunity was to be given him of repentance, and Elijah was sent in order to declare to him the cause of the national judgment and to promise him, on condition of his removing it, the immediate blessing of rain.

2. "Elijah went." A marvelous proof of the natural intrepidity of this prophet or his moral courage and his unlimited confidence in the protecting care of God that he ventured to approach the presence of the raging lion. "Sore famine." While it is clear, from chapter 17: 12-14, that the famine extended beyond the Kingdom of Israel, it is still probable that it was especially oppressive in Samaria and the provinces immediately adjacent. Corn must have been obtained for the people from Egypt or the adjoining countries else life could not have been sustained long.

II. Ahab and Obadiah searching for food (vs. 3-6). 3. "Obadiah." There were no less than twelve men by this name referred to in the Old Testament. The most conspicuous among them was Obadiah, the prophet. "Governor." He was an officer of high rank and great influence in Ahab's court. "Feared the Lord." It is, indeed, very remarkable that Obadiah, a devout worshiper of Jehovah, was allowed to retain his position when Jezebel was putting forth every effort to rid the country of God's true followers. No doubt it was because Obadiah could be trusted. He was a man of integrity and industry—the sort of a man that Ahab would wish to appoint over his household. It is an uncommon to find wicked men and have Christianity employing Christians preferably to others, simply because it is to their interest to do so.

4. "Cut off the prophets." The story of Jezebel's slaughter of the prophets is given us, but it is referred to in this lesson and in chapter 19: 10-14. Not satisfied in establishing the worship of Baal this wicked woman undertook to exterminate the prophets of the Lord. The persecution she had probably ordered was vengeance because Elijah could not be found, and on suspicion that they were privy to his concealment. No doubt the larger number whom Jezebel cut off were sons of the prophets, those who belonged to the schools of the prophets, which we learn from 2 Kings 2 were both numerous and largely frequented. It was 100 of these men whom Obadiah saved in a time of persecution. "By fifty." That he hid them in two caves, fifty in each. These were they of whom the world was not worthy, mentioned in Heb. 11: 38 as noble exemplars of faith. "Fed them." This was done secretly, at his own expense, and at the risk of losing his position and his life, and would, therefore, be a strong proof that he was a true worshiper of Jehovah. 5. "Go through the land" (R. V.) It is said to be a custom in the East, when a public calamity reaches its highest point, for the King himself and his chief minister to go forth and seek relief. This shows further how high was the position of Obadiah in the service and confidence of the King.

III. Elijah meets Obadiah (vs. 7-16). "Met him." Deeming it imprudent to rush without previous intimation into the presence of Ahab, the prophet solicits Obadiah to announce his return to the King. "Knew him." The prophet's garb would make him easy to recognize, but he must have been seen more than once in Samaria. "On his face." To Obadiah Elijah was God's true representative. By his actions Obadiah showed his profound respect and love for the prophet. "Is it thou?" (R. V.) His language and actions are full of emotion and surprise. Is it thou, to find whom every royal service has been exhausted; thou, Elijah, in broad daylight, right here near the city of Samaria? 8. "Tell thy lord." It was to be news of great interest to the King.

9. "Wherein have I sinned" (R. V.) Obadiah's fear is very natural. He is asked to carry a message to Ahab, who, on another disappearance of Elijah may be able to make untrue, in which case the wrath of the King would fall upon him. "He shall slay me." Thus we see how Obadiah distrusted Ahab. 10. "No nation," etc. Of course, Obadiah's words only apply to those countries immediately around Samaria into which Elijah could be supposed to have fled for refuge. But he employs the hyperbole or Oriental hyperbole, so frequently found in the Old Testament. "Took an oath." He caused each nation solemnly and formally affirm and swear that the prophet was not in their country. This shows the influence Ahab must have had over the surrounding nations.

12. "The spirit • • • shall carry thee." This may be an allusion to the sudden disappearance of Elijah after he announced the drought to Ahab. Evidently Obadiah regarded Elijah's concealment as only possible through divine assistance. 13. "I • • • fear the Lord." This and the following verse was not spoken in a boasting spirit, but merely to disclose to the prophet his true character and thus lead Elijah to spare him from what seemed to him to be almost certain death. The worshipers had not all perished; there were some who still held to the pure religion of Jehovah. 13. "Was it not told Obadiah's thought seems to be that he could believe nothing but evil of one who was in the household of Ahab. After Elijah had disnelled all the apprehensions of Obadiah and had positively asserted that he would show himself to Ahab that day, Obadiah conveyed the prophet's message to the King.

IV. Elijah meets Ahab (vs. 17-19). When Elijah and Ahab met, the King said: "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?" In the question he really charged Elijah with bringing the famine upon the nation. But the prophet boldly told the King that the cause of the national calamity was his own ungodly doings in forsaking the Lord and establishing Baal worship in the land. He then demanded of Ahab that he gather all Israel and the prophets of Baal and Asherah upon Mount Carmel. This Ahab proceeded to do.

KOREANS A PRETTY RACE

MOST STRIKING THING ABOUT THEM IS THE WAY THEY WALK.

The Korean Dude Is Said to Be Quite a Superior Article—Is Called "Yang Ban," or Noble, and He Oppresses the Common People Woefully.

Although months ago, it seems only yesterday that whenever I had half an hour to spare in Seoul I used to loiter in a shop and watch the crowd of passers-by. It was situated in the main street, just inside the gate. A few small purchases had brought me the eternal friendship of the proprietor, who always had a long pipe ready for me longer than my arm, so that he always had to light it. The people, as seen in everyday life, interest me more in a strange country than palaces or show places. If I had to choose, I would prefer to see a slum rather than a "Baedeker", "sight" in a new city.

My friend was a vender of brass pots of all sizes but of only three shapes, that shone like burnished gold on the shelves around, and were arranged outside the open front. There was no fuss or bustle about his business, or importuning for custom; he would sit calmly with his legs tucked under him on the platform, about two feet off the ground, smoking innumerable pipes and wrapped in Oriental calm and his voluminous white garments. The laundering of his other clothes or suits, appeared to be perpetually in progress, as could be heard by the whack-whack of the sticks beating on a roller, which came constantly from the back of the premises telling that his wife was at work at the Korean method of ironing, by which the unimaginable satin-like gloss is given to the surface.

It was a quaint and interesting procession that passed outside. The Koreans are distinctly a handsome race. They are not in the least like either of their neighbors, the Chinese or the Japanese. Although they have the oblique eyes of the Mongolian, their features are, as a rule, straight, or slightly aquiline, their foreheads high, and their oval faces clear-cut and individual. The majority of a Chinese crowd looks to me always as if their heads had been cast in bullet molds, while it is quite otherwise with the Koreans. His white suit is spotless and there is not a hair straying from his "Mang-Kun," a crownless skull cap of horsehair gauze coming well down over his forehead and fastened on tightly as to produce a permanent furrow in his skin and frequent headache, to be borne for the sake of fashion. On this his hat, also of horsehair, is poised and tied under his chin, the black ribbons. If he has brown eyes, it has been darkened with lampblack to the fashionable shade. He is invariably attended by a servant, he carries nothing for himself, not even his pipe; even going to school their books are carried for them. When he goes he is attended by as many servants as he can possibly muster. When he rides, he does not even hold the reins of his diminutive horse. It is led, and servants attend him on either side of the high saddle on which he is perched. Seoul simply swarms with these young toffs, who come up from all parts of the country to this center of that political intrigue in which the Yang-bans live, move and has his being. He never all his life does any work himself; this would be the worst bad form and altogether infra dig. These Yang-bans are the curse of Korea. The common people are woefully oppressed by them. If a peasant is known to have accumulated a little money it is not long before the local Yangban comes down on him, perhaps nominally for a loan, which is never repaid, or perhaps for a levy in aid and comfort. If the hind objects, his property is taken up the Yangban's yamen and kept there until he pays, or is imprisoned on some trumped-up charge and kept locked up until his relatives produce the required amount.

One great peculiarity of the streets of Seoul is that during the daytime practically no women are to be seen out. Occasionally sees an old woman of the lower class, dressed much as the men, but wearing a cloak over her head, holding it with her hands, so as to conceal the greater part of her face. About 8 o'clock in the evening the great bell in the center of the city rings, which is the signal for all women to retire off the streets, and gives permission to the women to emerge from their seclusion. This extraordinary regulation is strictly enforced, except as regards blind men, foreigners and persons going with prescriptions for the sick. Korean men are frequently found going about with sticks pretending to be blind; but such is the rigid seclusion that the majority of the ladies of Seoul have never seen the streets of their city by daylight. From 8 o'clock until 12 the streets are alive with women, most of them attended by servants carrying lanterns. During this time they go visiting their friends. At 12 o'clock the great bell tolls again, from which time they have to be indoors, and men are again at liberty to go out if they like.—London Chronicle.

SUPERSTITIONS OF THE MALAYS.

Peculiar Belief of an Eastern People in Signs and Omens.

You can scarcely ever get your money from a Malay on Friday, because they believe that if they pay their creditors on a Friday they will be overtaken by penury. Malays never shave or cut their nails on Saturday or Tuesday, because these are unlucky days, and if they do part with their hair or nails on these days they believe that they will always be in trouble or will die quickly. The Malay never sleeps in the afternoon, for such an action shortens life! When a rat bites a Malay's clothes, it signifies ill luck, and usually the rat-bitten clothes are given to the poor.

There is a kind of bird called by the Malays Rowk-rowk which does not build a nest, and lives in fields. The Malays say that whoever obtains a Rowk-rowk's nest will become invisible as soon as he puts the nest on his head. Of course, the Malays believe that there is such a nest, despite the fact that the bird never builds one.

If a Malay feels that his right hand is itchy, he is glad because he will receive a large sum of money, and if he feels that his right eye moves, he knows that he will see a foreign friend. If tears issue from either eye, he understands that a relative of his will die, and if he too often forgets his promises to his many friends, he is aware that he will die and will shed tears rather profusely.

When there is an eclipse of the moon or sun the Malays abstain from taking food and perform their ablutions, in order that no contagious disease may attack them. Crows are an ill omen, and whenever a crow cawcaws near a Malay habitation, it means death to some one of the inmates. Supposing a Malay walks along a road and suddenly a black cat crosses before him, he will at once turn back and walk another path. The crossing of the black cat signifies danger involving the loss of life.

You seldom see Malays bite their nails, because this action is likely to lead the doer into poverty. If a Malay sees a pig or a Chinese funeral before the sun rises, say at 5.30 a. m., he knows that he is lucky, and whatever he does on this day he is sure to meet with success. Dreaming of jumping a brooklet assures the dreamer that death will ensue in a short time, and in this case the unhappy man generally distributes alms to the poor so that his life may be prolonged. To see a monkey in the morning is an ill omen and signifies that the seer will lose money heavily in trade.—Penang Straits Echo.

The Camera Hunter.

To the hunter with the camera every wild creature is lawful and desirable game, and the open season lasts 12 months in the year, says Country Life in America. It is a most exciting sport "shooting" at birds in flight. In Florida the camera hunter stops his boat in a good locality and withdraws the slide from the plate, and waits in instant readiness for whatever may come along. A water turkey wings past, visible, as it advances, upon the ground-glass. The middle finger and thumb of the left hand turn a screw and focus, the thumb of the right presses the trigger, and the bird is ours, though it still continues its rapid flight; a thousandfold more valuable in this form than if maimed and mauled, for thousands of people can now see it, and the splendid scene as well. The writer is called a good shot with the gun, but what care I now for my gun—which hangs long neglected in a closet—as compared with my cameras! And what surprising things these flight pictures show! Who, for instance, would imagine that a bird could ever assume such a grotesque attitude as does the cormorant when she springs from her nest?

Cat Summoned Maid.

A wonderful cat attracted the attention of every one who recently passed up or down Eighth street on the west side between Locust and Spruce. Pussy was pure white. She was standing upon the step railing of a house which was just high enough to enable her to reach the electric button with her paw. She manipulated this so vigorously that the door was soon opened by a servant, who picked pussy up, took her in her arms, entered the house and closed the door. It was the sentiment of all who witnessed the trick that Maria, or whatever her name might be, was a bright cat.—Philadelphia Evening Telegraph.

Wooden Shoes.

"The wooden shoe," says A. Qunerhish of Holland, "is worn almost exclusively by the peasant classes, and they find them more comfortable than the leather shoes that are form in America. The foot is clad in a heavy woolen stocking, and then slipped into the shoe without fastening. They never fall off because the people are used to wearing them. They would not exchange, because any other kind would not be comfortable. The shoes are elm wood and cost from ten to fifteen cents of American money. Two pairs will last a year."

A Deduction.

The late Channing Clapp of Boston was for some years after the civil war a cotton planter in the south.

Mr. Clapp had on his plantation a little boy in buttons called "Sam."

"Sam" one afternoon pointed to a bottle on his master's bureau and said:

"Mars Channing, am datt hair oil?"

"Mercy, no, 'Sam,' that's glue," said Mr. Clapp.

"I guess dass why I can't git mah cap off," said "Sam," thoughtfully.

Denounces Khaki Uniforms.

Mayor Jameson said in the British parliament the other day that the sudden resort to khaki uniforms was a "senseless craze." Because the Boers wore khaki and slouch hats the whole army was slapped into similar costume. If the Zulus had beaten it, the army would have gone about in feathers and paint. Three streaks of paint and an ostrich feather would have been the uniform of a field marshal.

AN OLD MAN'S TRIBUTE.

An Ohio Fruit Raiser, 78 Years Old, Cured of a Terrible Case After Ten Years of Suffering.

Sidney Justus, fruit dealer, of Mentor, Ohio, says: "I was cured by Doan's Kidney Pills of a severe case of kidney trouble, of eight or ten years' standing. I suffered the most severe backache and other pains in the region of the kidneys. These were especially severe when stooping to lift anything, and often I could hardly straighten my back. The aching was bad in the daytime, but just as bad at night, and I was always lame in the morning. I was bothered with rheumatic pains and dropsical swelling of the feet. The urinary passages were painful, and the secretions were discolored and so free that often I had to rise at night. I felt tired all day. Half a box served to relieve me, and three boxes effected a permanent cure."

WAS EVERYTHING TO HIM.

Whisky Not Alone Meat and Drink, But Washing and Lodging.

Mrs. John A. Logan, who has succeeded Miss Clara Barton in the presidency of the Red Cross, was educated in Kentucky.

In condemning intemperance Mrs. Logan said recently.

"Alcohol vitiates the mind that the degradation it imposes on its victims hardly seems like degradation to them. The woes of these men are changed to blessings in their besotted brains.

"For instance," said Mrs. Logan, smiling, "there used to live in Kentucky an old man called Fawcett Jones. Fawcett drank to excess, and he used to declare that whisky was meat and drink to him. But one hot summer night he drank so much that he fell into a puddle on the way home, and in this puddle he lay snoring until dawn.

"A clergyman who had risen early found him with his head in the mud and his legs and body in the water, and the good man woke him up.

"'Ah,' he said, 'so whisky is meat and drink to you, is it, Fawcett?'

"Fawcett rose to his feet and began to wring out his clothes.

"'It certainly is,' he said, and washing and lodging, too, sir.'"

Emperor Menelik Flattered.

Sir John Harrington, who has been made minister plenipotentiary from King Edward's court to that of Menelik of Abyssinia, was appointed British agent in Abyssinia in 1898. He has done many things to establish cordial relations between the two countries. One of his great achievements was to persuade her late majesty to speak into a phonograph a message to Menelik and his empress. It was the only time she ever consented to such an experiment, and it was done then on the express understanding that when the message had once been spoken the record should be destroyed. Menelik was so excited when he heard the great queen's message in her own voice that he repeatedly stopped the machine in order to have a salute fired and his empress was so flattered to hear her own name mentioned that she called out her bodyguard as a mark of respect.

THE SUNDAY SCHOO

INTERNATIONAL LESSON COMMENT FOR AUGUST 14.

Subject: Obadiah and Elijah, I Ki xviii., 1-16—Golden Text, I Ki xviii., 13—Memory Verses, 5, 6—Commentary on the Day's Lesson.

I. Elijah goes to meet Ahab (vs. 1, 2). 1. "Many days." The waiting time must have seemed long to Elijah. "The third year." It is supposed that he dwelt by the Cherith about a year and at Zarephath two years and six months. It is now in the third year since he went to Zarephath. "Go." Elijah made no move only as he had directions from God. The time had come when the people were in a state of mind to receive the benefit God intended them to receive through the terrible calamity that had come upon them. "Unto Ahab." The King had remained obdurate and unreformed. Another opportunity was to be given him of repentance, and Elijah was sent in order to declare to him the cause of the national judgment and to promise him, on condition of his removing it, the immediate sending of rain.

2. "Elijah went." A marvelous proof of the natural intrepidity of this prophet or his moral courage and his unlimited confidence in the protecting care of God that he ventured to approach the presence of the raging lion. "Sore famine." While it is clear, from chapter 17: 12-14, that the famine extended beyond the Kingdom of Israel, it is still probable that it was especially oppressive in Samaria and the provinces immediately adjacent. Corn must have been obtained for the people from Egypt or the adjoining countries else life could not have been sustained long.

II. Ahab and Obadiah searching for food (vs. 3-6). 3. "Obadiah." There are no less than twelve men by this name referred to in the Old Testament. The most conspicuous among them was Obadiah, the prophet. "Governor." He was an officer of high rank and great influence in Ahab's court. "Feared the Lord." It is, indeed, very remarkable that Obadiah, a devout worshiper of Jehovah, was allowed to retain his position when Jezebel was putting forth every effort to rid the country of God's true followers. No doubt it was because Obadiah could be trusted. He was a man of integrity and industry—just the sort of a man that Ahab would want to appoint over his household. It is not uncommon to find wicked men and haters of Christianity employing Christians preferably to others, simply because it is for their interest to do so.

4. "Cut off the prophets." The story of Jezebel's slaughter of the prophets is not given us, but it is referred to in this lesson and in chapter 19: 10-14. Not satisfied in establishing the worship of Baal this wicked woman undertook to exterminate the prophets of the Lord. The persecution she had probably ordered in vengeance because Elijah could not be found, and on suspicion that they were privy to his concealment. No doubt the larger number whom Jezebel cut off were sons of the prophets, those who belonged to the schools of the prophets, which we learn from 2 Kings 2 were both numerous and largely frequented. It was 100 of these men whom Obadiah saved in a time of persecution. "By fifty." That is, he hid them in two caves, fifty in each. These were they of whom the world was not worthy, mentioned in Heb. 11: 38, noble exemplars of faith. "Fed them." This was done secretly, at his own expense, and at the risk of losing his position and his life, and would, therefore, be a strong proof that he was a true worshiper of Jehovah. 5. "Go through the land" (R. V.) It is said to be a custom in the East, when a public calamity reaches its highest point, for the King himself and his chief minister to go forth and seek relief. This shows further how high was the position of Obadiah in service and confidence of the King.

III. Elijah meets Obadiah (vs. 7-16). "Met him." Deeming it imprudent to rush without previous intimation into the presence of Ahab, the prophet sent Obadiah to announce his return to the King. "Knew him." The prophet's appearance would make him easy to recognize, for he must have been seen more than once in Samaria. "On his face." To Obadiah Elijah was God's true representative. By his actions Obadiah showed his heart found respect and love for the prophet. "Is it thou?" (R. V.) His language and actions are full of emotion and surprise. Is it thou, to find whom every royal service has been exhausted; thou, Elijah, in broad daylight, right here near the palace of Samaria! 8. "Tell thy lord." It was to be news of great interest to the King. 9. "Wherein have I sinned" (R. V.) Obadiah's fear is very natural. He had asked to carry a message to Ahab. What another disappearance of Elijah may mean to make untrue, in which case the wrath of the King would fall upon him. "Will slay me." Thus we see how Obadiah distrusted Ahab. 10. "No nation," etc. Of course, Obadiah's words only apply to those countries immediately around Israel into which Elijah could be supposed to have fled for refuge. But he employs the language or Oriental hyperbole, so frequently found in the Old Testament. "Took an oath." He caused each nation solemnly and formally affirm and record that the prophet was not in their territory. This shows the influence Ahab must have had over the surrounding nations.

12. "The spirit • • • shall carry." This may be an allusion to the sudden disappearance of Elijah after he announced the drought to Ahab. Evidently Obadiah regarded Elijah's concealment as only possible through divine assistance. "I • • • fear the Lord." This and the following verse was not spoken in a boasting spirit, but merely to disclose to the prophet his true character and thus to induce Elijah to spare him from what seemed to him to be almost certain death. The true worshipers had not all perished; there were some who still held to the pure religion of Jehovah. 13. "Was it not told my lord Obadiah's thought seems to be that Elijah could believe nothing but evil of one who was in the household of Ahab. 14. After Elijah had dispelled all the apprehensions of Obadiah and had positively asserted that he would show himself unto Ahab that day, Obadiah conveyed the prophet's message to the King.

IV. Elijah meets Ahab (vs. 17-19). When Elijah and Ahab met, the King said unto him, "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?" In this question he really charged Elijah with bringing the famine upon the nation. He thought to awe him into submission, but the prophet boldly told the King that the cause of the national calamity was his own ungodly doings in forsaking the Lord and establishing Baal worship in the land. He then demanded of Ahab that he gather all Israel and the prophets of Baal and Asherah upon Mount Carmel. This Ahab proceeded to do.

DREANS A PRETTY RACE

ST STRIKING THING ABOUT EM IS THE WAY THEY WALK.

e Korean Dude Is Said to Be Quite Superior Article—Is Called "Yang Ban," or Noble, and He Oppresses the Common People Woefully.

Although months ago, it seems only yesterday that whenever I had half an hour to spare in Seoul I used to loiter in a shop and watch the crowd of passers-by. It was situated in the main street, just inside the gate. A few small purchases had brought me the eternal friendship of the proprietor, who always had a long pipe ready for me, longer than my arm, so that he always had to light it. The people as seen in everyday life, interest more in a strange country than places or show places. If I had to choose, I would prefer to see a slum than a "Baedeker" "sight" in a new city.

My friend was a vender of brass pots of all sizes but of only three types, that shone like burnished gold on the shelves around, and were arranged outside the open front. There was no fuss or bustle about his business, or importuning for custom; he would sit calmly with his legs tucked under him on the platform, about two feet off the ground, smoking innumerable pipes and wrapped in Oriental calm and his voluminous white garments. The laundering of his other clothes or suits, appeared to be perpetually in progress, as could be heard by the whack-whack of the sticks beating on a roller, which came constantly from the back of the premises telling that his wife was at work at the Korean method of ironing, by which the unsurpassable satin-like gloss is given to the surface.

It was a quaint and interesting procession that passed outside. The Koreans are distinctly a handsome race. They are not in the least like either of their neighbors, the Chinese or the Japanese. Although they have the oblique eyes of the Mongolian, their features are, as a rule, straight, or slightly aquiline, their foreheads high, and their oval faces clear-cut and individual. The majority of a Chinese crowd look to me always as if their heads had been cast in bullet molds, while this is quite otherwise with the Koreans. The most striking thing about the Korean is the way he walks. He carries himself better than the man of any place I know. There is practically nothing to indicate to a stranger difference of rank, but as you watch a man coming along the street there is a slight swing, redolent of immense dignity, that points out the patrician to the most casual onlooker. Some of them look as if they were always walking up the center of a palace chamber to the dais, amid admiring eyes. It is not swagger, but a very quiet, superlative self-consciousness of their own worth of position. The young "Yangban," or noble, is a delicious study. No London, Paris or New York swell, flaneur or dude is in it with him. His white suit is spotless and there is not a hair straying from the "Mang-Kun," a crownless skull cap of horsehair gauze coming well down over his forehead and fastened tightly as to produce a permanent groove in his skin and frequent headaches, to be borne for the sake of fashion. On this his hat, also of horsehair, is poised and tied under his chin, the black ribbons. If he has brown hair, it has been darkened with lampblack to the fashionable shade. He is invariably attended by a servant, he carries nothing for himself, not even a pipe; even going to school their books are carried for them. When he travels he is attended by as many servants as he can possibly muster. When he rides, he does not even hold the reins of his diminutive horse. It is led, and servants attend him on either side of the high saddle on which he is perched. Seoul simply swarms with these young toffs, who come up from all parts of the country to this center of that political intrigue in which the Yang-ban lives, moves and has his being. He never all his life does any work himself; this would be the worst kind of form and altogether infra dig. He is not above being supported by his relatives, and will even wink at the fact of his wife at home surreptitiously taking in washing to earn a little toward the household expenses, perhaps a big pretentious yamen, having a lot of ground and in a chronic state of dilapidation and decay.

These Yang-bans are the curse of Korea. The common people are woefully oppressed by them. If a peasant is known to have accumulated a little money it is not long before the local Yang-ban comes down on him, and, in shape nominally for a loan, which is never repaid, or perhaps for a levy more and simple. If the hind objects, he is promptly taken to the Yang-ban's yamen and kept there until he pays, or is imprisoned on some trumped-up charge and kept locked up until his relatives produce the required amount.

One great peculiarity of the streets of Seoul is that during the daytime practically no women are to be seen out. One occasionally sees an old woman of the lower class, dressed as much as the men, but wearing a cloak over her head, holding it in her hands, so as to conceal the lower part of her face. About 8 o'clock in the evening the great bell in Seoul tolls, which is the signal for all to retire off the streets, and gives permission to the women to emerge from their seclusion. This extraordinary regulation is strictly enforced, except as regards blind men, foreigners and persons going with prescriptions for the sick. Korean men are frequently found going about with sticks and pretending to be blind; but such is the rigid seclusion that the majority of the ladies of Seoul have never seen the streets of their city by daylight. From 8 o'clock until 12 the streets are alive with women, most of them attended by servants carrying lanterns. During this time they go visiting their friends. At 12 o'clock the great bell tolls again, from which time they have to be indoors, and men are again at liberty to go out if they like.—London Chronicle.

SUPERSTITIONS OF THE MALAYS.

Peculiar Belief of an Eastern People in Signs and Omens.

You can scarcely ever get your money from a Malay on Friday, because they believe that if they pay their creditors on a Friday they will be overtaken by penury. Malays never shave or cut their nails on Saturday or Tuesday, because these are unlucky days, and if they do part with their hair or nails on these days they believe that they will always be in trouble or will die quickly. The Malay never sleeps in the afternoon, for such an action shortens life! When a rat bites a Malay's clothes, it signifies ill luck, and usually the rat-bitten clothes are given to the poor.

There is a kind of bird called by the Malays Rowk-rowk which does not build a nest, and lives in fields. The Malays say that whoever obtains a Rowk-rowk's nest will become invisible as soon as he puts the nest on his head. Of course, the Malays believe that there is such a nest, despite the fact that the bird never builds one.

If a Malay feels that his right hand is itchy, he is glad because he will receive a large sum of money, and if he feels that his right eye moves, he knows that he will see a foreign friend. If tears issue from either eye, he understands that a relative of his will die, and if he too often forgets his promises to his many friends, he is aware that he will die and will shed tears rather profusely.

When there is an eclipse of the moon or sun the Malays abstain from taking food and perform their ablutions, in order that no contagious disease may attack them. Crows are an ill omen, and whenever a crow cawcaws near a Malay habitation, it means death to some one of the inmates. Supposing a Malay walks along a road and suddenly a black cat crosses before him, he will at once turn back and walk another path. The crossing of the black cat signifies danger involving the loss of life.

You seldom see Malays bite their nails, because this action is likely to lead the doer into poverty. If a Malay sees a pig or a Chinese funeral before the sun rises, say at 5.30 a. m., he knows that he is lucky, and whatever he does on this day he is sure to meet with success. Dreaming of jumping a brooklet assures the dreamer that death will ensue in a short time, and in this case the unhappy man generally distributes alms to the poor so that his life may be prolonged. To see a monkey in the morning is an ill omen and signifies that the seer will lose money heavily in trade.—Penang Straits Echo.

The Camera Hunter.

To the hunter with the camera every wild creature is lawful and desirable game, and the open season lasts 12 months in the year, says Country Life in America. It is a most exciting sport "shooting" at birds in flight. In Florida the camera hunter stops his boat in a good locality and withdraws the slide from the plate, and waits in instant readiness for whatever may come along. A water turkey wings past, visible, as it advances, upon the ground-glass. The middle finger and thumb of the left hand turn a screw and focus, the thumb of the right presses the trigger, and the bird is ours, though it still continues its rapid flight; a thousandfold more valuable in this form than if maimed and mauled, for thousands of people can now see it, and the splendid scene as well. The writer is called a good shot with the gun, but what care I now for my gun—which hangs long neglected in a closet—as compared with my cameras! And what surprising things these flight pictures show! Who, for instance, would imagine that a bird could ever assume such a grotesque attitude as does the cormorant when she springs from her nest?

Cat Summoned Maid.

A wonderful cat attracted the attention of every one who recently passed up or down Eighth street on the west side between Locust and Spruce. Pussy was pure white. She was standing upon the step ralling of a house which was just high enough to enable her to reach the electric button with her paw. She manipulated this so vigorously that the door was soon opened by a servant, who picked pussy up, took her in her arms, entered the house and closed the door. It was the sentiment of all who witnessed the trick that Maria, or whatever her name might be, was a bright cat.—Philadelphia Evening Telegraph.

Wooden Shoes.

"The wooden shoe," says A. Qunerhish of Holland, "is worn almost exclusively by the peasant classes, and they find them more comfortable than the leather shoes that are forn in America. The foot is clad in a heavy woolen stocking, and then slipped into the shoe without fastening. They never fall off because the people are used to wearing them. They would not exchange, because any other kind would not be comfortable. The shoes are elm wood and cost from ten to fifteen cents of American money. Two pairs will last a year."

A Deduction.

The late Channing Clapp of Boston was for some years after the civil war a cotton planter in the south.

Mr. Clapp had on his plantation a little boy in buttons called "Sam."

"Sam" one afternoon pointed to a bottle on his master's bureau and said:

"Mars Channing, am datt hair oil?"

"Mercy, no, 'Sam,' that's glue," said Mr. Clapp.

"I guess dass why I can't git mah cap off," said "Sam," thoughtfully.

Denounces Khaki Uniforms.

Mayor Jameson said in the British parliament the other day that the sudden resort to khaki uniforms was a "senseless craze." Because the Boers wore khaki and slouch hats the whole army was slapped into similar costume. If the Zulus had beaten it, the army would have gone about in feathers and paint. Three streaks of paint and an ostrich feather would have been the uniform of a field marshal.

Care of the Hair.

It is now generally agreed that many of the shampoos in use are injurious to the hair. The best treatment is frequent brushing and absolute cleanliness. Wash the hair in a lather of Ivory Soap and rinse thoroughly. Let the last water be cool, as it closes the pores of the skin and prevents colds.—ELEANOR R. PARKER.

AN OLD MAN'S TRIBUTE.

An Ohio Fruit Raiser, 70 Years Old, Cured of a Terrible Case After Ten Years of Suffering.

Sidney Justus, fruit dealer, of Mentor, Ohio, says: "I was cured by Doan's Kidney Pills of a severe case of kidney trouble, of eight or ten years' standing. I suffered the most severe backache and other pains in the region of the kidneys. These were especially severe when stooping to lift anything, and often I could hardly straighten my back. The aching was bad in the daytime, but just as bad at night, and I was always lame in the morning. I was bothered with rheumatic pains and dropsical swelling of the feet. The urinary passages were painful, and the secretions were discolored and so free that often I had to rise at night. I felt tired all day. Half a box served to relieve me, and three boxes effected a permanent cure."

Whisky Not Alone Meat and Drink, But Washing and Lodging.

Mrs. John A. Logan, who has succeeded Miss Clara Barton in the presidency of the Red Cross, was educated in Kentucky.

In condemning intemperance Mrs. Logan said recently.

"Alcohol vitiates the mind that the degradation it imposes on its victims hardly seems like degradation to them. The woes of these men are changed to blessings in their besotted brains.

"For instance," said Mrs. Logan, smiling, "there used to live in Kentucky an old man called Fawcett Jones. Fawcett drank to excess, and he used to declare that whisky was meat and drink to him. But one hot summer night he drank so much that he fell into a puddle on the way home, and in this puddle he lay snoring until dawn.

"A clergyman who had risen early found him with his head in the mud and his legs and body in the water, and the good man woke him up.

"'Ah,' he said, 'so whisky is meat and drink to you, is it, Fawcett?'

"Fawcett rose to his feet and began to wring out his clothes.

"'It certainly is,' he said, and washing and lodging, too, sir.'"

Emperor Menelik Flattered.

Sir John Harrington, who has been made minister plenipotentiary from King Edward's court to that of Menelik of Abyssinia, was appointed British agent in Abyssinia in 1898. He has done many things to establish cordial relations between the two countries. One of his great achievements was to persuade her late majesty to speak into a phonograph a message to Menelik and his empress. It was the only time she ever consented to such an experiment, and it was done then on the express understanding that when the message had once been spoken the record should be destroyed. Menelik was so excited when he heard the great queen's message in her own voice that he repeatedly stopped the machine in order to have a salute fired and his empress was so flattered to hear her own name mentioned that she called out her bodyguard as a mark of respect.

PARKER RESIGNS AS JUDGE

Leaves Court of Appeals After Presiding at Brief Session.

BECOMES PRIVATE CITIZEN AGAIN

Surrounded by His Old Associates the Democratic Candidate For the Presidency Bids Farewell to the Bench—Returns to Esopus, N. Y., After Formalities at State Capital.

Albany, N. Y.—Shortly after 3 o'clock in the afternoon Alton B. Parker ceased to be Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals. He arrived in this city at 1 o'clock to keep an engagement made with the Appeals Judges, and from 2 until 3 o'clock was with them in the consultation room, where they passed upon sixty-six opinions, practically clearing the calendar of the court. The Judges present were Parker, O'Brien, Martin, Vann, Cullen and Werner. The absentees were Judges Gray, Bartlett and Haight, who are in Europe.

At 3.05 the session was at an end, and Judge Parker invited the correspondents into the main chamber, introducing them to the several Judges. Then, before a question could be asked as to his resignation, he turned, and with a wave of his hand said: "Gentlemen, this room was mine." In the next moment he called Buell C. Andrews, one of the clerks, and handing him an envelope asked him to file it with the Secretary of State. To the correspondent a copy, which is as follows, was handed:

"Hon. John F. O'Brien, Secretary of State:

"Sir—I hereby respectfully resign my office as Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals of the State of New York, such resignation to take effect immediately. ALTON B. PARKER.

"Rosemont, Esopus, N. Y., August 5, 1904."

The Democratic candidate declined to discuss his resignation, but several of his associates were anxious to be quoted in expressing their high regard for Mr. Parker. Judge Martin, who is to go off the bench this year because of age, summed up Judge Parker as a good fellow, a faithful friend and a fearless Judge. Judges O'Brien, Vann, Werner and Cullen expressed the opinion that the court would suffer a personal loss by the absence of Judge Parker. It became known after the session that Judge Parker had written his associates three weeks ago asking them to hold this afternoon's meeting and wind up the business of the court, so that he might go more actively into politics. He departed for Esopus at 5.30 p. m.

Outside the house at the time the murderer was found were gathered fully 1000 persons, and as Watson, heavily manacled, was conducted down the steps to the police patrol wagon the air resounded with cries of "Kill him!" "Lynch him!" from the crowd which surged toward the officers as if it desired to take the prisoner.

CYCLIST HOLDS UP AUTO

New Yorkers Robbed of $1000 and Jewels Near Willow Grove, Pa.

Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Hall and Two Women Friends Were Detained by a Highwayman Who Rode a Moto Cycle.

Philadelphia, Pa.—A. C. Hall, of 337 Broadway, New York City, with a party in an automobile, while en route on Old York road, was held up at the point of a pistol and robbed by a daring highwayman who rode a motor cycle. The highwayman secured $1000 in money and jewelry and made his escape, leaving no possible clew. In the automobile with Mr. Hall were Mrs. Hall, Mrs. Arthur L. Jackson and Mrs. Thomas C. Walton.

They were on their way to the Delaware Water Gap. Mr. Hall and his party left Philadelphia in the afternoon at 4.30 o'clock for the Delaware Water Gap. They had just come up from Atlantic City. Arriving at Willow Grove the party took supper in the Casino at the park there and stayed until 9 p. m. listening to the music of the band. Leaving Willow Grove in the big red double cylinder touring car the party started for Easton by way of Doylestown.

All went well until a heavy grade four and a half miles from Willow Grove was reached. Mr. Hall slowed up to take the steep hill. As he neared the cross roads at the summit he heard the toot of an auto horn and thought another machine was approaching. Then in the light of his own headlight Mr. Hall discerned a motor cyclist fifty feet away. The cyclist rode up to the automobile and pulling out a pistol called:

"Get out of that machine —— quick—hurry now!"

"Why, what do you mean!" gasped the astonished Mr. Hall.

"I mean just what I say, and be quick," replied the highwayman.

At that Mr. Hall got down to the ground, assisting the frightened women to alight after him. The highwayman then searched all four, taking Mr. Hall's money and the jewels from the women.

"I need your gasoline. My machine has run out."

The request was complied with under the suasion of the revolvers, which he kept constantly aimed at the party.

Connecting a rubber tube between the two tanks, the polite highwayman set the pumps working, and soon had the fuel transferred from the touring car to his own tank. This completely disabled the Halls' vehicle, and left their party reduced to locomotion by foot power.

His work completed, the motor footpad bid the party all "Good night," blew three toots on his bicycle horn and sped away in the direction of Philadelphia.

The victims, after a consultation, walked two miles to the toll gate and obtained a conveyance there to drive them to Doylestown, Pa. It was at that village that the motor cycle holdup was first reported about midnight.

GOVERNOR IN DISGUISE

Nebraska's Executive Goes to South Omaha Stock Yards.

UNNOTICED AMONG STRIKERS

After Careful Investigation Governor John Mickey Concludes Not to Send State Troops to the Scene of Trouble—Declares the City to Be Safe—Mingles With Both Sides.

South Omaha, Neb.—Disguised as a laborer, Governor John Mickey, of Nebraska, mingled with the strikers and strike breakers here, joined with the crowd in a run on the Armour plant and fell back with the others when confronted by a line of deputy sheriffs, and unknown in his workingman's garb personally investigated the conditions in the great meat strike here.

As a resut of his investigation the Governor now refuses to send any State troops to South Omaha for the present. He had been requested to send a company of the National Guard to protect the non-union workmen who, it was alleged, were being interfered with when they attempted to enter the packing plant.

The Governor, when the Sheriff and packers had made the request for the soldiers and stated their case, said he would take the matter under consideration. Then after having seen the things the packers desired he should see, he returned to his home in Lincoln.

He donned the clothing of a laborer and quietly returned to South Omaha, incognito, to make an investigation of the other side of the case. At an early hour he was mingling with the strikers, thousands of whom surrounded the packing houses. No one recognized him and he soon was hearing the opinions of the strikers as to how long the trouble would last, how the plants were being run with non-union men and what methods were considered to draw away the strike-breakers.

Shortly after Governor Mickey arrived on the scene, the strikers suddenly broke for Armours, where it was reported an attempt to run in a carload of strike-breakers was being made. The Governor stayed with the strikers and ran to the plant. Before reaching it, however, the crowd was halted by deputy sheriffs, and the Governor stood in the front row and watched the strike-breakers, of whom there were fifty, enter the plant and go to work. The strikers attempted no interference.

For three hours Governor Mickey remained among the strikers and says he received information as to how a strike is run. Then he was recognized by Sheriff Powers, who was amazed at seeing the Governor in a workingman's garb. But the Governor quickly told his mission and then and there announced that no troops would be ordered to South Omaha so long as the strikers remained in their present state.

"Things are absolutely safe in South Omaha, and there is no reason to call out the troops," he says. "I know what I am talking about now, for I have seen and heard just about the whole thing."

When Governor Mickey returned to his home in Lincoln he was still wearing his disguise as a laborer.

BOY'S BLOW KILLS POLICEMAN.

Youngster in Charlotte, N. C., Resisted When Caught After a Chase.

Charlotte, N. C.—J. W. Brown, a member of the Charlotte police force, was killed by Paul Biggers, a sixteen-year-old white boy.

Biggers had been arrested for violating a city ordinance, and after the hearing the boy passed the police officer and laughed or sneered at him. Brown thereupon gave chase and laid hold of Biggers, who struck him in the stomach with his fist. The officer knocked the boy senseless with his club.

A large crowd gathered and threats against the officer were made, but the crowd was kept back and the boy was taken to the police station. Brown was taken ill shortly after as a result of the blow struck by Biggers, and died a few hours later.

ROB TRAIN PASSENGERS

Held Up Only Twenty Miles From the City of Chicago.

Load of St. Louis Excursionists Are Boldly Robbed by Five Masked Men—One Victim is Shot.

Chicago, Ill.—Five masked men held up an Illinois Central train within twenty-five miles of Chicago and lined up the passengers in the Pullman cars with pistols pointing at them and searched them for valuables.

The train that was held up was a special bound for St. Louis, filled with excursionists going to the World's Fair.

The robbers boarded the train between Flossmore and Matteson, and with drawn revolvers climbed into cab and ordered the engineer to stop.

The engineer brought the train to a standstill at a lonely place near some woods, and the conductor and brakeman, who ran forward to find out the cause of the train stopping, were also ordered to throw up their hands and were searched for weapons.

After the engineer, fireman and the trainmen had handed over what money they had they were marched back to the baggage car. The robbers were disappointed at finding that they had held up a train without an express car, but determined to make the best of the job by robbing the passengers of whatever money and valuables they might possess.

The passengers were ordered to march out of the cars and line up beside the train. Women and children, terrified at the appearance of the masked men, screamed and tried to hide under the seats. The robbers, however, made a careful search of the cars and were sure they had all the passengers under the muzzles of their revolvers before they began to rob them. All had to hold up their hands.

A man who was one of the last to leave the train, struggled against a robber who was holding him, when he was dragged from the platform. One of the masked men drew back and in full sight of the passengers fired directly at the man's breast and he fell to the ground dangerously wounded.

"That's what the next man will get that acts that way," said a man who seemed to be leader of the gang.

After the robbers had secured all the booty they could find, they backed off to the woods and escaped.

The train proceeded to Kankakee, sixty miles distant, under full steam, and at that station Superintendent Gross, who was on board, left the sleeper and notified Chief of Detectives O'Keefe of the road, of the robbery.

At 1.10 o'clock a special train with police officers and employes of the Illinois Central left for the scene of the robbery to hunt down the robbers who, it was believed, were either hiding in the marshes near Madison or had doubled and were working back toward Chicago.

GAMBLER KILLED IN HIS ROOM.

Charles Bosworth Murdered in New Britain, Conn.

New Britain, Conn.—Charles Bosworth, a gambler, aged fifty-three years, was found lying unconscious in a pool of blood in the back room of the second floor of Ward's Building, on Main street, shortly before noon. He died in the hospital at 4 p. m., not having recovered consciousness. He was murdered and the police have no clue to his assailants.

When Bosworth was found there were several wounds on his head, his pockets were turned inside out, and a diamond ring had been torn from his finger. The room was evidently used as a policy shop, as numerous envelopes containing policy slips were found on the table, which, with four chairs, comprised the entire furniture of the room.

HAITIAN SOLDIERS RIOT.

Attempt to Pillage Central Market and Near-by Shops.

Port-au-Prince, Haiti.—The most serious disorders are anticipated here. The population is very much excited by the continued rise in the prices of all merchandise, and a band of soldiers made an attempt to begin pillaging the Central Market and the shops in that vicinity.

Troops and police immediately intervened and re-established order, but in the fight many men were wounded. All the stores in Port-au-Prince were closed.

A number of Syrians were stoned in the streets. Two of them were wounded, and their stalls, surrounding the Central Market, were destroyed by soldiers.

Chicago, Ill.—The officers of the Illinois Central Railroad increased the reward of $1000 for the arrest and conviction of the bandits who held up the Diamond Special near Matteson, Ill., to $4000, a reward of $1000 for each of the robbers.

The passengers lost $1000 and a number of watches by the robbery, which was at first reported to have been done by one man. Later it developed that four men were concerned in it. The conductor of the train is positive that the bandits were formerly employes of the railroad.

WARNING SENT TO TURKEY

Washington Loses Patience in Negotiations With Porte.

WARSHIPS ORDERED TO SMYRNA

Admiral Jewell With the Olympia, Cleveland and Baltimore is Ordered to Proceed to Smyrna From Villefranche and There to Await Orders From Naval Department at Washington.

Washington, D. C.—It is evidently the intention of this Government to make it known to the Sublime Porte that the United States has become weary of the persistent evasions and obstruction in connection with the efforts that have been pending for a long time to secure for citizens of the United States the same rights and privileges that are accorded to those of other nations. The promises of the Sultan have been repeatedly broken, and upon the report and recommendation of Minister Leishman American war vessels will drop their anchors in the harbor of Smyrna.

Americans do not have the same freedom in traveling in Turkey that is enjoyed by the citizens of European countries, and this is especially true of professional men. American educational institutions are discriminated against, American scientists are not permitted to engage in making excavations, a privilege enjoyed by their professional brethren of other countries; American missionaries are hindered in the prosecution of their work, and facilities for doing business are withheld from Americans that are accorded to business men of other countries.

In addition to these general matters there are individual cases of transgression on the part of the Turkish officials through which suffering and loss have been imposed on Americans. With reference to these our Minister has not been able to reach satisfactory conclusions, and in several instances where the Minister for Foreign Affairs had entered into agreement with Mr. Leishman the Grand Vizier has interfered, nullified the agreements and countermanded the orders of the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Two years ago Mr. Leishman appealed to the Sultan against the conduct of the Grand Vizier in nullifying agreements made by the Foreign Minister. The Grand Vizier refused to receive Mr. Leishman when he called for explanations, a courtesy that is always extended, even to the dragomans of the embassies.

Recently Mr. Leishman was instructed by Secretary Hay urgently to insist that the Sultan should take action on the request of the United States for the removal of all restrictions placed upon its citizens residing or traveling in Turkey that were not imposed on the citizens of other countries, but Mr. Leishman has not been able to get any satisfaction.

It has now been decided that war vessels shall be sent to Turkish waters to strengthen the demands made by the American Minister. Accordingly orders have been sent to Admiral Jewell, commanding the European Squadron, which is now at Villefranche, to proceed at once to Smyrna. Admiral Jewell's squadron consists of the Olympia, Baltimore, and Cleveland. These vessels will sail from Villefranche. At Smyrna the Admiral will receive orders from the Secretary of the Navy.

The battleship squadron, under command of Admiral Barker, is due at Gibraltar, and it is understood that it will be held in the Mediterranean for the present awaiting the outcome of instructions sent to Minister Leishman.

BOMB HURLED IN CROWD

Saloon Keepers' Feud in Upper New York City Results in a Free Fight. Bomb Thrower is Arrested.

New York City.—While an Italian picnic was being held in a lot in One Hundred and Fifty-first street, between Park and Morris avenues, a bomb was thrown into the crowd, and according to the police, about twenty persons were injured. The man said to have thrown the bomb escaped, but was arrested at his home and sent to the Lincoln Hospital a prisoner.

A bar had been set up in the center of the lot, in charge of Peter Dimerio of 415 East One Hundred and Fifty-first street. Dimerio later told the police that Vincenzio Donnetto of 413 East One Hundred and Fifty-second street, stepped up to his stand at 9 o'clock and demanded money. Dimerio refused to give him any, and upon Donnetto moved back a few feet, and, drawing a bomb from his pocket, threw it at a barrel in front of the stand.

A terrific explosion followed, and men, women and children ran screaming in every direction.

"What are you trying to do, kill everybody here?" Dimerio says he shouted at Donnetto.

Donnetto made no reply. He had been thrown down by the explosion and, so far as is known, was not severely injured than any one else. He picked himself up, however, and ran as rapidly as he could. Though he was injured himself, Dimerio pursued Donnetto as far as Park avenue, where he lost sight of him.

The bomb throwing is said to have grown out of a dispute between rival saloonkeepers. Giovanni Finelli conducted a saloon at 469 East One Hundred and Fifty-first street until August 1, when the rent was raised from $60 to $75 a month. Finelli refused to pay the additional $25 asked and moved out. Giovanni Belelo promptly paid the $75 and reopened the saloon. Finelli then began to erect a building across the street at 476 East One Hundred and Fifty-first street. The foundation had been laid and the doors nailed down, but the walls had not been erected, nor was there a roof of any kind over the place, which is little more than a platform.

Notwithstanding his limited facilities he ordered several barrels of beer, which were tapped on the platform, and everybody who passed by was asked to partake of free beer. Many accepted the invitation, and in a short while there were at least 2000 persons gathered around Finelli's improvised bar.

Not to be outdone, Belelo sent his agents across the street, and every one was invited to come to his saloon and get free beer.

About 600 Italians were in the immediate vicinity, about half being friends of Belelo and half friends of Finelli. Several fights occurred between the two factions. About 9 o'clock, it is said, Donnetto approached Dimerio, who was acting as a sort of bouncer, and demanded money and threw the bomb.

Acting Chief Magan of the Harlem Station, with Detectives Murphy and Kern, went to Donpetto's home.

The police were refused admittance, Donnetto shotting that he would commit suicide if they came near him. The door was forced, however, and he was placed under arrest. His left leg was torn from the hip to the knee, so he was sent to Lincoln Hospital. The police think that he is a member of the "Black Hand" society.

Conductor Sharp left his car before the crash and can not be found.

IT IS A BOY.

Russia Rejoices in the Birth of an Heir to the Throne.

A son and heir to the Russian throne was born Friday, the 12th. The empress and child are doing well. In receiving the congratulations of his court the emperor said:

"I am happier at the birth of a son and heir than a victory of my troops, for I wait the future calmly and without fear, knowing by this sign that the war will be brought to a happy conclusion."

An imperial salute of 101 guns was subsequently fired, first from Peterhof and then it was repeated by all the forts around St. Petersburg.

The christening of the heir will take place in a fortnight. It will be a ceremony of the most elaborate sort. In accordance with Russian imperial custom, it will be performed in the imperial chapel of the Peterhof palace, credited with being the most magnificent chapel in Russia. The child will be named Alexis.

The emperor was greatly restricted in the choice of a name for the heir to the throne from the fact that the imperial initials, which are on all public edifices, saddle clothes, railway wagons, etc., are "A" and "N." The selection of a name not beginning with these letters would entail enormous expense should the heir come to the throne. There are a great many traditions about the name.

ADMIRAL WITHOFT KILLED.

Blown to Pieces by a Japanese Shell on the Czarevitch.

Admiral Withoft was standing on the bridge of the battleship Czarevitch at the height of the battle, when a shell exploded blowing him to atoms. The casualties aboard the Czarevitch were 210 killed and 60 wounded. The battle ship is reported at Kiao Chou with its steering gear shot away and most of the machinery so damaged as to be useless.

A message from Chee Foo says the Russian cruiser Novik, which took refuge at Kiao Chow, escaped from there at the expiration of the twenty-four hours' limit.

The Japanese embassy received from Tokio a report sent by Admiral Togo on Wednesday's fight. The report says five of the six Russian battleships in the fight are believed to be seriously damaged. The Pobieda's masts were broken off. The Retvizan apparently suffered most. The message adds that the Japanese damages have already been temporarily repaired.

Admiral Togo, it is learned, concentrated fire on the battleships and this accounts for the escape of the cruisers. It is ascertained that five battleships with the cruisers Diana and Bayan are now at Port Arthur.

JAIL DELIVERY

At Centerville Narrowly Frustrated—One Prisoner Escaped.

What came very near being a wholesale jail delivery occurred at Centerville Tuesday. Sheriff Crawford had seventeen prisoners in jail and during the day they were allowed to take exercise in the corridor of the jail.

In some way Nolie Woodie and his brother, Frank Woodie, charged with burglary, unlocked the door leading into the jail yard and were soon at liberty. In a few moments all the prisoners desiring to escape would have done so, but Hugh Watson, a white man charged with murder in the first degree, closed he door and kept any other prisoners from escaping.

One of the negroes was shot and recaptured. The other escaped.

Lost an Arm.

Simon Pridmore, fourteen years old, was the victim of a terrible accident in the yards of the Southern railway in Columbus, Miss. The young man boarded a box car attached to a switch engine near the depot intending to ride to the crossing a few blocks away. As the car passed over a switch he lost his holding and was thrown underneath the car. The trucks hit his body as he was falling and dragged him for some distance, but his right arm was run over by the wheels and almost completely severed just below his shoulder.

THE EASTERN OCEANS

Now Controlled by Japanese. Russian Navy Defeated. Port Arthur Matters.

JAPANESE PRESS THEIR VICTORY.

Combined Attack on Port Arthur by Land and Sea—Reinforcements Arrive.

That a general land and naval attack was made on Port Arthur Monday is indicated by information from various sources.

A statement that the naval attack was made at 4 o'clock in the morning comes from an authoritative, but not diplomatic quarter.

Heavy fighting has occurred at Port Arthur during the past few days. The Japanese captured three Russian batteries and secured position close to the inner fortifications. Both sides lost heavily.

The Japanese have commenced a bombardment from Lang Mountain on the harbor and interior defenses.

Twelve additional Japanese regiments have reached Port Arthur.

It is stated on trustworthy authority that the mikado has ordered that Port Arthur must be taken at any cost even if it necessitates the suspension of operations in Manchuria, and it is quite possible that the main Japanese force will proceed to Port Arthur within a few days.

There is activity aboard the ships of the Baltic fleet. A large amount of sailors' baggage is being taken to the new battleship Orell. Orders have been issued that all torpedo boats and destroyers of the second division shall be called to full capacity. The boats are to await further orders in the small roadstead at Cronstadt.

An unconfirmed report says the Russian cruiser Novik, which put into Tsing Tau after the battle of August 10th off Port Arthur, and which coaled there and put to sea within her twenty-four hour limit, has been sunk forty miles from Tsing Tau.

The Russian minister has sent the Chinese government a strong note charging it with duplicity in the Reyeshiteini affair, charging the Chinese commodore with cowardice or treason, and demanding a full explanation, the restoration of the destroyer and severe punishment of the commodore. The Chinese government has demanded from the Japanese the restoration of the destroyer.

Vice Admiral Kamimura encountered the Russian Vladivostock squadron at dawn Sunday, north of Tsu island, in the straits of Korea, and attacked the enemy at once. The battle lasted five hours and resulted in a complete Japanese victory. The Russian cruiser Rurik was sunk and the cruisers Rossia and Gromobol fled to the northward after having sustained serious damage.

Vice Admiral Kamimura cables to the navy department that the injuries inflicted upon his vessels were slight. The fate of the crew of the Rurik is not known. It is presumed that many of them were killed or wounded. The strength of the fleet of Vice Admiral Kamimura is not known, but it is presumed that he had the Adsuma, Idsumo, Iwate and other light cruisers.

The expectation at St. Petersburg is that Port Arthur will fall at any moment. Special significance is attached to the fact that Lieutenant General Stoessel's wife and children went to Che Foo on board the torpedo boat destroyer Ryeshitelni.

Vice Admiral Kamimura rescued 600 of the crew of the Russian cruiser Rurik, sunk by his squadron off Tsu island.

The Largest Beet.

A beet, which is the largest one raised in Mississippi this season, and which is thought to be the biggest seen in the whole south, was shipped from Laurel to St. Louis to be placed among the rare horticultural treasures. This mammoth vegetable tapped the 13-pound mark, was 22 inches in circumference, 18 inches long, and required eighty cents for expressage.

Misunderstanding With Turkey is Adjusted.

After prolonged pourparleurs and considerable haggling on the part of the Turks a satisfactory solution of the American schools question has been arrived at.

This matter, which is the most important of the American demands, was settled by extending to American schools the same treatment as that accorded to schools under the protection of other powers. A settlement of other matters affecting American interests in Turkey of secondary importance has also been effected and Minister Leishman has telegraphed to Admiral Jewell, in command of the United States squadron sent to Smyrna, instructing him to salute the batteries on land and depart.

The sitting of the council of ministers at which the settlement was agreed upon was a long one and it was not until near its close that an agreement was reached. The delay in the settlement is believed to have been caused by the intervention of the palace functionaries whose policy in order to retain the sultan's favor consists of combating the rights and privileges of foreign subjects.

FIVE BOYS HURT

In a Runaway Near Gadsden, One Seriously.

A serious accident happened below Gadsden Saturday afternoon in which four boys were seriously hurt and one perhaps fatally. Farrington and Alexander Greet, Joe Price, John Riley and Sam Hughes were in a one-horse wagon on their way to the city with a wagon load of jugs filled with water from Mint springs for delivery to their customers.

As the horse came down a slight hill the holdback strap broke and the horse began to run when the wagon ran onto him. The boys grabbed for their lines and with two boys pulling on each line the horse ran into a ditch and turned the wagon over, throwing all of them out.

Joe Price had his left thigh broken in two places, just above the knee and again close to his body. All the boys are about 12 years old and playmates and were in the habit of going daily to the spring for water and this is the first accident they have ever had.

The boiler of the saw mill of J. F. Arnold, five miles from Senoia, Ga., exploded, killing four persons and injuring several others, how many is not known.

The dead:
J. F. Arnold, owner of the mill.
Buford Arnold.
Will Arnold, negro.
Unknown negro.

The injured included two negro employes, one of whom may die. The cause of the explosion is not known, but it is reported to have been low water in the boiler.

J. F. Arnold was one of the wealthiest and most popular men in the county.

New Bridges.

Jackson county's commissioners' court, after a week's session, has adjourned. Orders were made for the building of seven new steel bridges at a cost of $13,447.50 and for four wooden bridges to be let to the lowest responsible bidder. The contracts for the steel bridges were awarded to the Converse Bridge company of Chattanooga.

Fire at Montgomery.

The West End pharmacy, the West End barbershop and two cottages were destroyed by fire Sunday night. The loss is estimated at $6,000, covered by probably $4,000 insurance.

REDUCTION ACCEPTED.

Western Coal Miners Will Work for Lower Wages.

Coal miners of Kansas, Indian Territory, Arkansas, Texas and a part of Missouri have voted in favor of accepting the operators' wage proposition.

The proposition was for a reduction of 5 per cent in wages and affects 50,000 men.

District No. 14, which includes Kansas and a portion of Missouri, voted overwhelmingly against the proposition, giving a majority against it of 2,398. This was overcome, however, by the vote in districts No. 21 and 25, district No. 21 giving a majority of 4,688 for the proposition, while district No. 25 gave a majority of 2,096 votes in its favor.

Turkey Grants Demands.

The issues between Turkey and the United States were arranged Friday to the satisfaction of both governments.

Minister Leishman saw Tewfik Pasha, Turkish minister of foreign affairs, and renewed the urgent representations of the American government for an immediate settlement of the demands regarding the rights of American citizens in Turkey.

After the interview with the minister, Tewfik Pasha proceeded immediately to the palace.

The sending of a palace functionary unacquainted with the question to discuss the matter with Mr. Leishman is typical of Turkish methods. The sultan's ignoring of the proper channel, namely, the porte, is much commented on as evidently being an attempt to delay a settlement.

Called Him a Liar.

"If the man who just called me a liar will meet me outside of the park when I finish my speech, I'll cut his throat from ear to ear," declared Congressman Clark, of Missouri, during a joint debate with Congressman Chas. N. Landis, of Indiana, at New Albany, Ind.

Mr. Clark had referred to the assassination of ex-Governor Goebel, of Kentucky, charging that the republicans were protecting a man who should be hanged. "The republicans want to rule this country by assassination," he said.

Some one in the crowd cried: "You're a liar."

Immediately Congressman Clark shouted his challenge.

The area of the land purchased from France in 1803, the "Louisiana purchase," was 875,025 square miles, 55,000 square miles greater than the area of the original thirteen states and but 10,000 square miles less than the combined area of the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, Germany, Italy, The Netherlands and Switzerland, in which countries there is a total population of 202,364,000 people. In the states forming this Louisiana purchase there duce 60 per cent of the wheat raised in the United States, 43 per cent of the corn crop, and 40 per cent of the oat crop, 30 per cent of the wood product. This latter, valued at $16,000,000, was alone sufficient to reimburse the country for the original purchase of the territory.

Two diametrically opposite views of the kind of reading that ought to be provided for boys and girls were presented at a recent meeting of the Long Island Library Club. Miss Stevens, of the Girls' high school, maintained that the all-important thing was the direction of the reading of the young people so that their time might not be wasted on useless things. Mr. Mitchell, of the Boys' high school, held, on the contrary, that young readers should be let alone, except for a judicious weaning process which should gradually lead to something higher.

The shipment of apples from Nova Scotia to England continues. The steamer City of St. John's recently carried 10,000 barrels, and there were said to be 20,000 barrels still in the Annapolis Valley waiting to be shipped. It is estimated that the total shipment this year will reach 400,000 barrels, nearly all of which were forwarded via Halifax. Leading dealers estimated that, taking the home-market figures into consideration, over 500,000 barrels of merchantable apples were harvested in the Annapolis Valley last autumn, which averaged $2.75 a barrel.

LULLABY.

Low, low, by-low,
Dreamy eyes to slumber go,
I heard the moon-fay call, I know,
Droop thy tender eyelids so,
By-o, by-o.

Softly swings the maple bough
A cradle for the birds and thou
Nestling on thy mother's breast,
Cradled in that fragrant nest,
Sweetly rest, sweetly rest.

The fireflies gleam in grasses tall,
And over all the night dews fall,
Sweet and low the mock-birds call,
And dewy sleep has kissed thee, so
By-low, by-low.

The Courtin' of "Glitters."

I christened her "Glitters" at first sight. She was wearing tremulous gold earrings fully two inches long, and they sparkled and glittered in the sunlight as she moved her dark, feather-crowned head. I suppose she wore a hat, but the effect was principally feather; also she had some sort of a bead chain round her neck—glass beads—and they flashed and glittered too.

Her real name was Jane Em'ly, but I only discovered that later. For the rest she was a fine, splendidly formed young woman. She might have passed for a Greek goddess—Juno, or her like—had she not sold flowers at Charing Cross and worn a brown merino skirt and loose white blouse, for she had really good classical features and a perfectly magnificent bust and throat.

I used to buy flowers in those days, great bunches of sweet, strong-smelling stocks, more delicate and fragrant pink carnations, masses of pale pink and deep crimson roses, for Cynthia loved flowers and I loved Cynthia.

My first acquaintance with "Glitters" had something sensational about it. I was nearly the hero of a street fight. A coster belaboring a small and excessively patient donkey had aroused my wrath, and the same stalwart gentleman was inviting me to take off my coat and have it out with him—and I itched to do it, too, although I wore black cloth—when "Glitters" intervened.

She swept out from the crowd of onlookers, a perfect hurricane in petticoats, and with black flashing tongue told the coster plainly what she thought of him. Before she had finished I felt sorry for the man—absolutely sorry. Here was a splendid young woman telling him the most unpleasant facts about himself, and the crowd being with "Glitters," applauded every point.

With the appearance of a leisurely policeman her harangue ceased, and as the crowd melted and a dejected coster drove a small donkey on, "Glitters" turned to me, flushed with triumph.

"That's all right, guv'nor; I kin do 'im any di, that lot—dirty beast. Will you 'ave a flower, sir?"

With this professional cry, "Glitters" returned to her normal occupation, and, as she skillfully wired a buttonhole of lilies of the valley for me, I endeavored to form some idea of her character. She evidently mistrusted me at first, for when I hinted out a wish for better acquaintance she flushed angrily and judged me by my clerical garments a a netter of souls on the warpath.

"I ain't a-goin' to none of your missions—not me," she cried, with a fine burst of temper. "You parsons are all alike with your missions, tryin' to make us be'ave like mealy mouthed humbugs, an' I don't want no truck with you or your likes."

It took a few seconds to convince "Glitters" of her mistake, and a hint about a young lady for whom I should need to buy flowers delighted her. Where's the woman who does not anticipate a love story? Before I had bought a bunch of delightful, fresh-smelling daffodils, "Glitters" was smiling archly, and when I turned to go, carrying my spoils, she proffered me a bunch of violets as a free-will offering, saying simply, "For your young lidy, sir." The romance to her mind was concluded.

I told Cynthia all about the little adventure as she arranged the daffodils in a quaint, high brown jar, and she smiled prettily and tucked "Glitters'" violets into the bosom of her dress. She was wearing a pale mauve frock, I remember, and looked delightfully pretty, as she always did. I contrasted her delicate pink and white loveliness with the flower girl's ruddy health and comely strength; both women made in the same mold, and yet the difference of all the world between them. I wondered vaguely if Cynthia would ever repent her promise to marry a poor clergyman, and sigh for the luxury of this west end drawing room when queening it in my east end vicarage in the remote future.

"You do love me, Cynthia, darling?" I cried, hungrily.

She moved gently toward me, her silk skirts rustling, the faint odor of her favorite perfume pervading the air. When she reached my side she kissed my forehead softly.

"Foolish boy," she whispered, "don't I love you with all my heart?"

I remember straining her in my arms till she laughed and pleaded for mercy.

My acquaintance with "Glitters" progressed. I learned that she was one of four sisters, all three married save herself. When I expressed surprise that she belonged to the army of bachelor-maids, a toss of her head rewarded me.

"Wish I may die furst," said "Glitters." "What's the blessed good of getting married? A lot of kids and more kicks than ha'pence."

Her summing up, if crude, was fairly true. The position of the east end wife and mother has its drawbacks, and when she went on to tell me in strong and forcible language that one of her brothers-in-law was doing time for knocking his wife about and badly damaging her eye, and that another was rarely sober more than twice a week, I mentally agreed that celibacy had its advantages. Yet there was such womanliness in the girl's smile, and such generous hint in the swelling bust that one felt sorry for sweetness wasted.

Time passed, and with great diplomacy I managed to persuade "Glitters" to come to a big parish tea that was to signal my arrival at my new rectory. It was a far cry from Drury Lane to Stepney, but "Glitters" came, and, strange to say, escorted by a red-faced and hugely embarrassed young coster. She had previously asked me if I might bring a pal, but somehow or other I had expected to see another lady of plush and feathers.

When I made my next floral purchase, I laughingly rallied her on the subject. To my surprise, she flushed crimson.

"Git out," was her first smartly delivered retort; "I'm no such bloomin' fool as to marry. If ever you ketch me messin' abaht wi' that cove agin ——" Her silence was eloquent.

"Have you refused the poor fellow? Oh, Glitters! Glitters!" and after raising his hopes by letting him escort you! A nice-looking chap, too, broad and of good inches."

"Yus, he do look nobby," agreed "Glitters," with a slight sigh; then her voice hardened. "P'raps I mayn't never see him no more—an' I wish I could sling my 'ook I do—but I won't never marry."

Her full lips closed sullenly, and I remembered the tragedy of a drunken father and sadly abused mother that must have darkened the girl's youth. Speech on the subject was useless, so I forebore.

It must have been some time in October when I ran across "Glitters'" coster again. Yes, I know now it was October because my own wedding was fixed for the middle of December, and Cynthia had only just settled the date.

Poor coster boy, he had been hardly treated, for since our last meeting Fate, in the guise of a runaway van, had dashed him to the ground and crippled him for life. He was hobbling along on crutches, and told me he had only been out of the hospital a week. I forbore to speak to him of "Glitters;" that subject might be raw yet. When asked what he was going to do for a living, he spoke bravely on the subject of the sale of papers, looking curiously bright and contented. I marveled at his courage, and after asking him to come and look me up, turned on my heel and left him, wondering at the patience of the poor and the strange, pathetic resignation to trouble.

A fortnight later I was buying a great bunch of vivid autumn foliage—one read the date of the year in "Glitters'" big basket—when I suddenly became conscious of a change in the girl's face. It had grown far softer, all its frank boldness gone. Also there was something delightful in her smile, a depth, a warmth lacking before. Her very voice had changed; it was not half so self-assertive, yet had more strength in it.

I looked at "Glitters." Her eyes fell before mine and a great wave dyed her face, even to the white throat barely hid by her kerchief. Then she smiled, a slow, conscious smile, and lauged a little nervously.

"'Ave some vilets, sir; jist a penny bunch for the lidy."

"Glitters," I remarked, sternly, "I am not to be put off in that crafty fashion. What have you been doing with yourself to look so happy?"

"Lord love you, sir—'ow you do go on! Did you want the vilets?"

Ah, the mystery was out, for, holding up a bunch of sweet purple violets, moist among green leaves, "Glitters" betrayed her secret.

"Why are you wearing a wedding ring, madam?" I asked, smiling.

"D'yer think I was a-going to see 'im down on his luck and not comfort 'im? Lay your life not. Why! I loved 'im all the time, but niver so much as now. Thank yer, sir," for I had grasped her hands, and stood holding them tightly; "thank yer kind."

"And, Glitters, my dear, splendid girl, you are happy?" I cried; "really and truly happy?"

"'Appy?" her whole face lighted up. "S'elp me, Gawd, I'm 'appy—there, now, you've got it straight."

I took off my hat to this daughter of the people, as to a queen in her own right, and walked away, glad that I had seen how grand a woman can be. When I reached home I found a letter from Cynthia awaiting me. I knew the large handwriting, the blue crest, and the faint perfume that always clung to her notes, and I seized on it eagerly, for I had found her out when I called.

A quite short letter, merely breaking off the engagement on the score of the worldly wisdom of "mamma," and Cynthia's distaste for gray poverty and soup kitchens. I was stunned for a second, then I remembered how often I had met Lord Ancaster and Cynthia lately—and I saw clearly at last.

I tore up the letter into tiny fragments, and rather envied a certain crippled coster.—Claude Askew, in London Free Lance.

WHAT WAS IT?

Horrible End of Tom White Seen by Friends Many Miles Distant.

A Mr. Erwell was staying at an old farmhouse, occupied by a Mr. George White and his wife, together with the former's aged mother. The younger son, Tom, was a naval engineer, absent on a long voyage.

On a night toward the end of Mr. Erwell's stay, George White and his wife were spending the evening with a neighbor. Erwell and old Mrs. White sat before the wide, old-fashioned hearth of the kitchen, chatting over old times, and lapsing now and again into meditative silence.

In the midst of one such pause Mrs. White suddenly seized her companion by the arm, and, pointing to the fire, said in an awe-struck voice, "Look!"

To his amazement, Erwell saw that the ruddy glow of the coal was slowly losing its color. Even as he looked, indeed, the fire became perfectly black.

Now there came a dull sound of hammering on metal. It ceased as abruptly as it began. A door opened at the back of the grate, and a man appeared, bearing in one hand a hammer; in the other a candle. It was Tom White, the naval engineer.

The figure came into the grate, looked around, placed the candle on the floor; then, taking a tool from his pocket, advanced to a corner of the fireplace, and seemed to be repairing something.

This finished, he took up the candle and returned to the door by which he had entered. It was shut.

He turned his head for a moment, and Erwell saw on his face a look of horror and dismay. Quickly he set down the candle, and, raising the hammer, beat on the door with all his might.

Desisting from this, he began to walk rapidly to and fro, a look of agony on his face. Next, he knelt for a moment, as if in prayer, but was quickly up again and frantically hammering on the door. And now he kept lifting his feet rapidly, as though the floor was burning them, and seemed to be gasping for breath. The candle melted to running grease, and suddenly Tom White fell to the floor, and on his face there was a look of terrible suffering. Twice he rolled over, then lay still. His limbs seemed to shrivel up, an odor of burning filled the room—and suddenly the whole thing vanished. The fire resumed its ordinary light, and Erwell, rousing himself with an effort, gave a long, shuddering sigh, murmuring,

"What a terrible dream!"

With that, he turned to the old lady by his side. She was dead!

About a month later Mr. George White received a letter from a foreign port detailing his brother's death under the following terrible circumstances:

On the eve of sailing from an Australian town, Tom White was ordered by the chief engineer to remedy a defect which had been discovered in the boiler's safety-valve. For this purpose the lad entered a small iron compartment immediately above the boiler and started work. Shortly afterward the captain passed by, and, unaware that any one was within, closed the door, which he found standing ajar. Poor Tom's fate was sealed!

Later in the day the vessel started, and when young White was missed and inquiries made about him, his shriveled body was found on the floor of the iron room!—From "A Sheaf of Ghost Stories," in Pearson's.

ROMAN SUPERSTITIONS.

Belief in the Evil Eye Grows on Those Who Live Among Them.

The strangest thing about life in Rome is that one not only does as the Romans do, but ends by thinking as the Romans think, feeling as the Romans feel. The best illustration I know of this is the mental attitude of the foreign residents toward certain superstitions, notably the belief in the evil eye—the malocchio or jettatura, as is it indifferently called, writes Maud Howe in the July Century. I never knew an Italian who did not hold more or less to this sperstitions. Americans who have lived long in Rome either reluctaintly admit that "there does seem to be something in it," or, if they are Roman born, quietly accept it as one of those things in heaven and earth of which philosophy fails to take account.

In certain respects the Italian is markedly free from superstition as compared with the Celt or the Scot; for instances, the fear of ghosts or spirits is so rare that I have never met with it; on the other hand, the belief in the value of dreams as guides to action is deep-rooted and widespread. The dreambook in some families is held hardly second in importance to the book of prayer. The Italian's eminently practical nature makes him utilize his dreams in "playing the lotto," as the buying of lottery tickets is called. To dream of certain things indicates that one will be lucky and should play. The choice of the number is the chief preoccupation of the hardened lottery player—by the number on a bank note that has been lost and found again, or the number of a cab which has brought one home from a delightful festivity.

KANSAS' AMUSING PEST.

OFFICIAL EFFORTS TO GET RID OF THE PRAIRIE DOG.

There is an Official Prairie Dog Exterminator to Oversee the Work—Life Together of the Prairie Dog, the Owl and the Rattlesnake on the Prairie.

Official Prairie Dog Exterminator is the title given by the Legislature of Kansas to D. E. Lantz of Manhattan, Kan. Mr. Lantz's duties are to devise means of killing off the millions of prairie dogs that infest the western part of the State.

Ever since Western Kansas was settled the prairie dog has been a picturesque pest. He has devastated millions of acres of land and has been the indirect means of killing hundreds of head of valuable livestock.

He has been hunted and scalded, poisoned and conjured, but he has lived merrily through it all, and multiplied at a rate that even the prolific Belgian hare cannot equal. Finally, after two years of experiment, the State Agricultural College hit on a poison which, when properly and tactfully used—for the prairie dog is a keen rascal and not easily deceived—is warranted to lay low the hardiest dog that ever barked defiance to his foes.

This poison is thoroughly mixed with grain, but the same kind must never be used twice, else the dogs that escaped the first bait will ignore the second. A spoonful of it is put at the entrance of every hole. The unsuspecting dog, coming out to feed, finds his meal awaiting him. After guilelessly partaking of it, he hurriedly retreats to his burrow, to die alone. A dead prairie dog is never found on top of the ground.

Mr. Lantz reports that during the past two years the State has consumed about 1,200 pounds of strychnine and over half a ton of potassium cyanide in manufacturing the poison. From 600,000 to 700,000 acres of land formerly infested with the prairie dogs have been entirely reclaimed, while a partial destruction of them has been accomplished over a much larger area, including some of the best alfalfa ranches in the State.

Only since alfalfa growing reached its present proportions in Western Kansas has the prairie dog problem been such a grave one. Prior to that the land was hardly worth the trouble of driving out the invaders.

It is impossible even to estimate accurately the vast number of dogs that form a single town. On a ranch in Scott County owned by C. S. Gilbert of Wichita there is a single town which covers 350 acres. The houses average 700 to the acre, and each house is known to contain not less than five dogs. This would bring the total population of this single town up to something like 1,225,000 dogs, to say nothing of a full complement of owls and rattlesnakes.

That prairie dogs, rattlesnakes and owls live together in the same holes is well known. The assertion is often made that they are a happy family, pursuing a peaceful live-and-let-live policy, and doing co-operative housekeeping on an ideal basis.

This is far from being the case. The dogs and the owls live in peace together, though the owl is a lazy fellow and the dogs have to do all the work. But the snakes are interlopers, hated and feared alike by owl and dog, getting their living by the offspring of their hosts, and doing absolutely nothing in return for the favors shown them.

Of all the inhabitants of these populous cities the dogs come first, and do all the work, digging out the holes, building a firm, hollow cone around the opening to serve alike as a protection and as a point of vantage in viewing the remainder of the town, and later building the mysterious underground waterworks and drainage system that is so complete and amazing in its ingenuity.

Each hole connects with these laterals, which often underlie the city at a depth of from 40 to 100 feet, if it is necessary to go down so far for water. Each house also connects with every other house, so that the person who pours buckets of water in a hole after a retreating dog and then waits to see the dog's half drowned reappearance, is pretty sure to be disappointed.

The dogs live on buffalo grass. For variety, the little fellows eat loco weed, which is deadly in its effect on a horse or steer, but only serves to give the prairie dog a comfortable jag.

Shortly after a dog town is established the owls put in an appearance. There are no trees, hollow or otherwise, for them to inhabit, and as they are altogether too lazy to build their own holes, they simply move into the ones already prepared for them. They are harmless creatures, though, and the dogs do not resent their advent.

The snakes do not live in the towns in the same numbers as the dogs and owls, because these two, by uniting their efforts manage to kill a good many of them. In every prairie dog town a sealed hole is occasionally seen. Every sealed hole means that in it an unhappy rattler has threshed away his life.

To corner a rattler in a hole requires not a little work and ingenuity on the part of the dogs, for the snake is just as smart as they are in skurrying through underground passages, and it is only when preparation has been made beforehand, and the snake lured into some hole, the underground outlet to which has been already sealed, that he is really cornered. Then all enmity between dogs and owls is forgotten, and every town feud is buried, while all hands fall to and fill up the hole that the snake has entered. Relieving each other from time to time, clawing and digging, and shoving down, ever narrowing the quarters of the unhappy prisoner, they finally complete the job to their satisfaction, restore the conical mound and leave it there as a warning.

There are more snakes around dog towns in spring than at any other time. Baby prairie dogs may be had the year round, for four or five litters are brought forth annually, and each litter is of six or seven puppies. But the delights of owl eggs and of baby owls can be known only in the spring, and the snake never fails to take advantage of the season.

The prairie dog is the steel spring of the animal kingdom. Compared to his movements the stroke of a cat's paw is deliberate to the point of slowness.

At one moment he will be sitting on his haunches at the mouth of his hole, cheerfully barking at his fellows. The next, and you have not winked in between, he will have disappeared down the hole, and you see only the flash of his unimpressive tail as he goes. When he runs it is always in a zig-zag course, but there is not the slightest diminution of speed on the turns.

Morton Albaugh, State Bank Commissioner of Kansas, comes from the prairie dog end of the State, and has himself suffered from their inroads on his ranch. He insists that no legislative action would be necessary to rid the country of the pest if the people once realized how delicious the meat of the creature is.

He thinks, however, that before this state of things can be brought about the name will have to be changed to "prairie squirrel" or something of that sort. The word "dog" protects the creature from being eaten.—New York Sun.

FARMS KEEP CHILDREN BUSY.

Agriculture Takes Sixty-one of a Hundred Boy and Girl Workers.

In the July issue of the Massachusetts Labor Bulletin facts and figures are presented which put a new face upon the question and problem of child labor.

The article in the Bulletin is founded upon the magazine not of recent date stating that there are about seventeen hundred and fifty thousand children between the ages of ten and fifteen years employed in the mines and factories of the United States." That which the labor statistican corrects is the assertion as to the places where child labor is employed carried in the words "mines and factories."

By the census of 1900 there were employed in the productive industries of the country 1,752,187 children under sixteen years of age. The Labor Bulletin shows by tables made up from the officals reports that out of each 100 children at work nearly sixty-one were engaged in agricultural pursuits, where the conditions of employment are certainly very different from those existing in mines, mills or large factories. About sixteen in each 100 were engaged in domestic or personal service, many, probably the majority, in homes and surrounded by better influences than are found in mines or mills.

The number engaged in manufacuring and mechanical industries and mining was 284,330, or a little over sixteen in each 100 being a slight advance above those employed in domestic or personal service.

Of the 10,438,218 persons over ten years of age engaged in agricultural work in the country children under sixteen form 10.18 per cent.; of the 7,112,987 engaged in manufacturing, mechanical industries and mining 284,330, or about 4 per cent., are children.

The 1,752,187 children at work represent 5.98 per cent., or about six in the hundred of all persons ten years of age and over engaged in gainful occupations, but an examination of the table shows that this proportion is largely due to the great number of children engaged in agricultural pursuits.

This interesting ratio is presented at the close of the Bulletin paper:

The number of families in the United States in 1900 was 16,239,797; the average size being 4.7 persons. If each family had had one child under sixteen at work the whole number so employed would have been 16,239,797; the actual number employed was, as we have shown, 1,752,187, or 10 per cent. of the families had, on the average, one child under sixteen years of age at work.

Paid Smokers of Pipes.

With the growth of the hobby of smoking meerschaum pipes in Europe there have sprung up concerns which make a business of coloring these pipes. In Paris there are two firms which employ about a thousand men to do nothing but smoke. They are paid twenty cents an hour. They smoke mild tobacco in order that they can smoke a great length of time without getting a headache. They are a queer set. Some of them are persons of high educational attainments, who, being out of other employment, do not object to sitting in a cool spot, reading and smoking. It's a snap for them. Others of these hired smokers are ignorant fellows who have never achieved success in anything but smoking. The officials in Paris are trying to break up this business, claiming that it endangers the health of the hirelings.—Louis-

"Not to mention that the chimley smokes, an' the clapboards is all a-blowin' off the ruff," interpolated Elmira, with a pitying look at her mother's sad face.

The widow bowed her head on her hands, and the ready tears gushed forth. "I've lived here ever since I married your paw," she sobbed, brokenly. "He cleared the lan' hisself, an' put out the orchard. Them pippins was jest a-comin into bearin' that year he died. He'd a' paid off the mor'gidge rut an' branch, afore now if he'd lived, poor man!"

It was the mortgage on the old homestead which caused all the trouble, the widow being unable to pay even the interest, which had accumulated for several years, and her sons-in-law having declined to assist her.

"No use throwin' good money after bad," they declared, individually and collectively. "Best let the ole place go. It's most eat up with interest now, an' your maw kin hev a home with us long as she lives."

And despite her objections, the widow was forced to accept the proffered terms.

"Let me stay here at least till after the sale," she pleaded, and her request was granted.

"But you better git Margie to stay with you," urged Elmira. "Tain't fittin' fur you to stay here alone, bein' you're so deef; you wouldn't skeercely hear it if the house should burn down."

The three sisters, who lived in an adjoining township, having married well-to-do farmers in that locality, had met by appointment at the old homestead to lay the ultimatum which had been decided upon before their mother. Though a little selfish, they were not really heartless, and no doubt believed the change was a necessary measure. Their husbands could very well have afforded to keep the interest on the mortgage paid up during the widow's lifetime, but as they said, the expense would eat up the value of the farm and be of no especial benefit to themselves. So it was decided to let the mortgage be foreclosed.

How the Plans of the Selfish Daughters and the Mercenary Sons-in-Law Were Thwarted by an Able-Bodied Lad with a Ladder.

She's out o' place now, anyway, an' her brother's wife begrudges her every mouthful she eats. She could milk the cow an' help with the chores. An' if you girls would only let me keep the ole place while I live—it won't be many years—" her voice shook a little, "I wouldn't ask fur nothing more from any o' you! There's the garden, you know, an' the milk an' butter an' the eggs. Why, we could live like cows in clover! An' besides, I could knit socks. They pay forty cents a pair over to Turkey Holler—"

"Now, that's all foolishness, maw," interrupted Adaline, impatiently. "How do you reckon you an' Margie could git 'long with only one cow to milk? An' you know yourself you had to sell the team, an' every other hoof o' stock on the place 'ceptin' the milch cow, to pay the taxes, an' back int'rest on the mor'gidge. An' besides, the lan's all run down so it's too poor to raise blackeyed peas!"

"Not to mention that the chimley smokes, an' the clapboards is all a-blowin' off the ruff," interpolated Elmira, with a pitying look at her mother's sad face.

The widow bowed her head on her hands, and the ready tears gushed forth. "I've lived here ever since I married your paw," she sobbed, brokenly. "He cleared the lan' hisself, an' put out the orchard. Them pippins was jest a-comin' into bearin' that year he died. He'd a' paid off the mor'gidge out an' branch, afore now if he'd lived, poor man!"

It was the mortgage on the old homestead which caused all the trouble, the widow being unable to pay even the interest, which had accumulated for several years, and her sons-in-law having declined to assist her.

"No use throwin' good money after bad," they declared, individually and collectively. "Best let the ole place go. It's most eat up with interest now, an' your maw kin hev a home with us long as she lives."

And despite her objections, the widow was forced to accept the proffered terms.

"Let me stay here at least till after the sale," she pleaded, and her request was granted.

"But you better git Margie to stay with you," urged Elmira. "'Tain't fittin' fur you to stay here alone, bein' you're so deef; you wouldn't skeercely hear it if the house should burn down."

The three sisters, who lived in an adjoining township, having married well-to-do farmers in that locality, had met by appointment at the old homestead to lay the ultimatum which Lad been decided upon before their mother. Though a little selfish, they were not really heartless, and no doubt believed the change was a necessary measure. Their husbands could very well have afforded to keep the interest on the mortgage paid up during the widow's lifetime, but as they said, the expense would eat up the value of the farm and be of no especial benefit to themselves. So it was decided to let the mortgage be foreclosed.

"Seems to me maw is agin' awful fast," remarked Elmira, as the sisters took their departure in the hired conveyance which had brought them to the farm.

"Not much wonder, seein' paw was sick so long, an' her livin' all alone here since he died," assented Adaline. "I wanted her to come an' live with me, but she wouldn't hear to reason. Maw is powerful sot in her way, 'pears like."

Margie Filbert was very glad to keep her aunt company during the remaining weeks of her stay at the farm, and proved a great comfort to the lonely woman.

"Too bad the kitchen chimley smokes so," she declared on the second day of her stay. "If you don't mind, Aunt Clary, I'll git Dave Tallman to come over an' see what's the matter o' it. Must be filled up with swallers' nests, I reckon."

Mrs. Coppage looked up from her knitting. "To be sure, Margie! I'd be real glad if he'd come. An' mebbe he'll nail the clapboards on the ruff, too. The wind a-soughin' through makes a buddy feel real creepy! I hain't been up to the loft bedroom fur I dunno the time when, jest on account o' it."

"Them loose clapboards does make a curi's hummin' sound," admitted Margie. "I've notice it myself. But I reckon Dave kin suttle 'em."

"Dear, dear," sighed the widow, while her knitting-needles clicked an' accompaniment to the soliloquy, "I'm afeared it'll be a good while 'fore Dave an' Margie kin marry. Dave is real stiddy, an' industrous, too, but farm hands is as plenty as blackberries, an' has to take what they kin git. If 'twasn't fur that mor'gidge, now, him an' Margie could marry an' live here, an' I wouldn't hev to go, trapesin' 'round, a-livin' here an' there, with Ad'line an' Elmiry an' Becky. A nice time I'll hev, with all them kids, too. Six or seven apiece they've got all 'round, an' the wust-behaved young uns I ever see, if they air my own gran'childern!"

The brown old farmhouse, embowered in black-locust trees, its quaint gabled porches overrun with hop-vines and coral honeysuckle, took on an added picturesqueness in the hazy autumn sunshine. The widow's one cow was licking her calf across the half-broken-down rail fence, and the striped quails were calling "Bob White! Bob White!" from the neighboring corn-fields. As the red barn hens were cackling and guinea-fowls chattering, as if they were having a contest as to which could make the most noise.

Mrs. Coppage, her face well shaded by a black sunbonnet, was gathering round pippins in the near-by orchard, with a view to having apple dumplings for dinner.

Dave Tallman had already arrived, and had climbed a rickety ladder to investigate the smoky chimney.

The widow's meditations, which were none of the brightest, we may be sure were suddenly interrupted by a piercing shriek from Margie, and dropping her pippins, she flew to the house.

"Is Dave killed?" she gasped, on discovering the young man reclining limply on the porch, while Margie hovered over him with the camphor bottle in her hand. "I was afeared that ladder would break!"

Dave grinned sheepishly. "No, Miss Coppage, the ladder didn't break," he announced, as he tenderly chafed his ankle-bone. "I—I got bee-stung, an' dropped to the ground," he added, in answer to the widow's puzzled look.

Mrs. Coppage started first at Dave and then at Margie in bewilderment. "Bee-stung?" she repeated, incredulously.

"Yes, mom. There's a swarm o' bees has made a hive o' your chimley, Miss Coppage. The hull inside o' the ruff is lined with honeycomb, too—chock-full o' honey! It's a fact, an' no mistake. Put away the camfire, Margie, my ankle is all right again. 'Twasn't nothing but a bruise an' you an' Miss Coppage come an' take a peek fur yourselves."

The two women climbed gingerly up the ladder, one at a time, and discovered the truth of Dave's assertion. The high-gabled hip roof of the old homewas a regular storehouse of honey.

"No wonder you felt creepy, Aunt Clary," laughed Margie, "with all them bees a-hummin' overhead! Lucky the clapboards blowed off, too, or they couldn't 'a' got in."

"If I wasn't as deef as an adder I might 'a' heared 'em," admitted Mrs. Coppage, "though I hain't slep' in that part o' the house since your uncle died."

Dave looked shrewdly at the accumulated sweets. Part of the comb was discolored, as if with age, but a large portion was of a golden straw-color, bright and attractive.

"There ain't a grain less'n a ton, comb an' all," he declared, "an' its wuth forty cents a pound if it's wuth a cent."

The widow was overjoyed. "If there's half as much as that it'll pay off the mor'gidge an' leave a hundred dollars to boot," she assured herself, mentally, "an' I sha'n't have to leave my home an' live 'round with the girls after all!"

"Is it true, maw," demanded the three daughters, as they sprang nimbly down from the red farm wagon which had brought themselves and their husbands brimful of curiosity to learn the truth as to the wonderful rumors they had heard.

"Is what true?" asked Mrs. Coppage, as she welcomed her guests impartially.

"Why, that Dave Tallman found scuds o' honey in the house, an' that him an' Margie air a-goin' to marry an' run the place?" expounded Adaline, the self-appointed speaker, in a strident voice.

The widow smiled. She wore a new wrapper, the daughters noticed, and seemed to have recovered several years of her age since the last time they had seen her.

"Oh, yes, it's true enough, so fur as it goes," she returned. "But you hain't heared the hull o' it. Dave he sold the honey fur me to a big hotel in the city at a fancy price. An' I've paid off the mor'gidge, bought a couple more cows an' a new team, an' got a snug bit o' money put away in the bank."

"Wall, I declare!" chorused the sisters, shrilly. "An' you never let us know nothing 'bout it!"

"Didn't hev time," smiled the widow, calmly. "You see, Dave was bound him an' margie should marry today, so we had to hustle like a cat eatin' sassage to get her clo's ready. The suremony is over, an' we air jest about to set down to the weddin' dinner. So come on an' help eat it; there's a-plenty o' good vittles fur all."

But not even the bountiful feast which was spread, and to which they did ample justice, could glind the sons-in-law to the egregious and irremediable blunder they had made.

"The fat's in the fire now," they reflected. "If we had a-paid the interest on that mor'gidge we'd 'a' had a share in the profits o' the honey bizness, to say nothing o' bein' remembered in the ole lady's will. But it's too late now."

The glowing faces of Margie and Dave did not add to the happiness of the unbidden guests, who soon departed with no attempt to disguise their injured feelings.

Problem in Millinery.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

It will be a surprise to many to know that with all the money that has been spent on rivers and harbors in this country, the harbor of New York—the commercial metropolis of the country—is to-day inaccessible to the largest vessels now being used as freight steamers, says the Daily Free American. The Baltic was obliged to sail last week with a cargo 6,000 tons less than her capacity, because loaded to the full, she draws thirty-six and a half feet, while the channel furnishes only some thirty-two feet of safe passage. The economy of building these great vessels is lost in their ability to carry a full load, either into or out of the finest harbor on the Atlantic coast.

With 7 per cent. of the world's land area and 5 per cent. of its population, the United States has 25 per cent. of the world's wealth, declares Leslie's Weekly. The value of the United States property, real and personal, in 1900, was $94,000,000,000, as compared with $59,000,000,000 for Great Britain and Ireland, $48,000,000,000 for France, $45,000,000,000 for Germany, $32,000,000 for Russia, $22,000,000,000 for Austria-Hungary, $15,000,000,000 for Italy and $12,000,000,000 for Spain. Moreover the United States' lead of all the other nations in wealth is increasing faster than is her preponderance over them all (except Russia and China) in population.

It would be an interesting subject of inquiry whether sudden and extreme rises in temperature and especially high humidity are marked by variations in the curve of crime. If so, the explanation might be that when it is warm the average man keeps out of doors as much as possible. In cities this crowds the streets, and by multiplying the opportunities for contact with others increases the friction of social intercourse. Wherever it is even momentarily agreeable to be one is likely to find many. To resent jostling and intrusion is natural enough, and physical discomfort lowers the standards of self-respect and self-restraint. To say "Keep cool" is grim and irritating irony; to say, "Be patient toward all men, even if it involves some effort," is to give good hot-weather advice.

It may be reprehensible and almost illegal for a judge or a jury to be influenced by a woman's beauty to be kind to the woman, but if this were not possible we should all have to admit that woman's influence has its limits, avers the Boston Transcript. And this admission none of us wants to make. We would rather have it generally understood that with some men, most men in fact, a pretty woman in tears may have her way; but that with the other men, and a large minority it must be, susceptibility to femininity is not a part of their equipment. That lets out all those who want to be considered virtuous clear through. Perhaps women's clubs will take the matter up and manage to have it arranged that a woman shall be tried by women only. Then, we rather guess there will be no tampering with justice; neither will it be tempered over much.

In future the Delaware & Hudson railroad will employ none but young men—that is, it will take them from the ages of 21 to 35, and will probably allow them to take on years in service, but will not accept them for any position after they have passed the new age limit, the Brooklyn Eagle states. The authorities say that a man rarely develops into a good railroader after he has passed the prescribed period. In active service an employe of a railroad must be strong and have steady nerves, good hearing and good sight, and these are attributes of youth. He must be able to keep awake for 24 or 26 hours at a stretch, if need be, he must be alert in his mind and retentive in his memory. If the new provision is made for the safety of the general public, no fault can be found with it, for the welfare of the traveling body must dominate the private gain of the individual.

There is a broad tendency to guard and restrict very rigorously the killing of birds "for scientific purposes," says Forest and Stream. The conditions are much harder than they were for the ambitious young scientist. In New York, for instance, the last Legislature enacted that applicants for license to collect birds for scientific purposes shoud qualify in a bond of $200 for faithful observance of the law. This is only one manifestation of the growth of the idea of bird protection, which is one of the conspicuous popular movements of the day. The sentiment has reached Mexico. Consul W. W. Canda writes from Vera Cruz that an agitation has been on foot looking to the passage of a law to prevent the wanton destruction of birds throughout this country; a proposed law has already been presented to the Government by the Association for the Protection of Birds, and it is confidently expected that it will meet the approval of the Executive. This law is intended to prevent the killing of certain classes of birds useful to the agriculturist. Other kinds, such as, for instance, game birds, may be killed only at stated periods of the year. All birds of prey, and others destructive to the interests of the farmer, may be killed at any time and by anybody.

A SERMON FOR SUNDAY

A STRONG DISCOURSE ENTITLED, "AN ADVANCE ORDERED."

The Rev. Dr. John E. Adams Tells of the Law of Progress as Exemplified in the Waxing Strong of the Infant — We Should Seize Our Inheritance.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—Having been appointed Presiding Elder of the New York District of the New York East Conference, the Rev. Dr. John E. Adams, pastor of Grace M. E. Church, preached his closing sermons Sunday. During his pastorate of a little more than two years he has had marked success. The debt of the church, $20,000, was canceled in January, 1903, the mortgage burned and the church is now free from incumbrance. Sunday morning Dr. Adams preached on "An Advance Ordered." The text was from Exodus xiv: 15: "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward." Dr. Adams said:

When this advance was ordered, the Israelites were encamped on the coast of the Red Sea. Before them was the sea spread out for miles and leagues, and they had neither bridge nor boat, nor pontoon by which to cross it. Behind them was the army of Pharaoh, with horses and chariots, with trained warriors and skilled commanders, intent on their capture or destruction. On either side, it would seem, were formidable obstructions—mountains, or fortresses, or something that could not be passed—for the Israelites saw no way of escape and cried out for fear. In this perilous and apparently hopeless situation the people reproached Moses for the dreadful extremity to which they had been reduced; whereupon that holy man appealed to God for help, and then came, probably in tones of thunder that sounded in the ears of all the people full and clear above the roar of the sea, this strange order: "Wherefore criest thou unto Me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward."

Leaving now the literal narrative, except as we may have occasion to recur to it incidentally, let us attend to the moral meanings and uses of the text. The case before us is exceptional in nothing but the physical facts; the moral truths and underlying principles of this case are always and everywhere present among the people of God. Indeed, the principles here involved are so general and the analogies of universal history are so wide and complete that I think we are justified in regarding this text as the law of the universe applied to the church. The physical occasion of this text, in all of its essential features, finds its duplicate in the moral occasion of this service. We are the children of Israel ourselves. I can prove it by St. Paul: "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." The Red Sea is before us. Not that Red Sea that washes the sands of Arabia and floats the commerce of the East, but the Red Sea of moral hindrance—a sea that is deeper than the Atlantic Ocean and wider than the Pacific. Pharaoh's army is pursuing us. Not the antiquated Egyptian division, now extinct, but the infernal brigade itself, still in the field and strictly up to date in every particular—and these enemies from the nethermost pit, inspired with inconceivable hatred and, in the words of Milton, "armed with hell flames and fury," and following us in overwhelming numbers and with unappeasable fierceness. Such is our situation this very hour, and as we stand to-day amid these threatening environments, the captain of our salvation calls to us from heaven, "Go forward," and in obedience to this order lies our duty, our safety and our happiness.

Let us approach our subject step by step. God is the author of the universe. The universe existed in the Divine Mind as an ideal before it existed in itself as a substance. The ideal was complete and perfect as well as beautiful and good; but the first states of the actual universe did not realize that perfect ideal of the Divine Mind. What then? Did God fail? Did His active energy prove unequal to His beneficent intentions? By no means. God gave the universe this imperfect form at first, not because He could not do otherwise and had to abandon His ideal but because He saw it better to realize His ideal gradually through the law of progress than to realize it suddenly by an act of creative power. Deliberately and of His own volition God made the universe a crude mass of unorganized matter and force; and then, intrusting His sublime work to the law of progress operated by responsible intelligences, He directed that in due time all should be reduced to order, harmony and beauty. This is the story of the universe in its entirety and in its parts. This is the story of the worlds and of their productions. This is the story of minerals, vegetables and animals; of general species and individuals; of angels, women and men. This is the story of matter in all its combinations, of life in all its forms, and of mind in all its phenomena. This, in brief, so far as we have yet learned, is the story of all creation, and of all propagation.

Let me illustrate what I mean by the oak. God's ideal for the oak is a majestic tree, six feet in diameter and ten feet in height, with mighty roots taking deep hold of the rocks and mighty branches sweeping the clouds—a very giant that can wrestle with the storms and play with the lightnings. But in its beginning, as it sprouts from the acorn, the oak is a tiny shoot which the foot of a little child could effectually crush. God makes it thus and says to it, "Go forward;" and then the little plant, obedient to the Divine command, through cloud and sunshine and changing season, soon goes on and out and up, until at last, by means of the law of progress in the form of growth, it has fulfilled the word of God, and stands before the eyes of men in all the imposing grandeur of its towering and solid maturity.

Take the eagle as another illustration. God's ideal for the eagle is an imperial bird of great size and strength, with amazing keenness of vision and with pinions for majestic flight, the mountain crag its castle, and its pleasure ground the sky.

Such is the Divine ideal for this noble bird. But the young eaglet emerges from the shell a feeble little creature, and if you could see it during the first week or two of its existence, and could stroke with your hand its soft yellowish down and look into its pale bluish eyes, its feebleness would probably excite your pity. But as the little thing feeds and exercises, it grows and strengthens, until at last, under the operation of this law of progress, it can soar from the nest, launch into the air, gaze directly into the noonday sun, beat down the storm clouds under its seven foot spread of wings, and sail from continent to continent, through the oceans of azure above, over the oceans that roll below.

But in this discussion we must rise out of life into mind, and then still ascend from the intellectual to the spiritual. We will, therefore, consider man as an illustration of the truth we are pursuing. God's ideal for man is a most exalted and sublime being, with mental and moral endowments of tremendous scope, so immeasurably superior in parts and powers to all else we know, that it seems the whole creation must culminate in him. God designed man in His own image, intended him for communion and companionship with Himself, determined to make him His vice-regent here on the earth, and proposed at last to share the government of the universe with Him forever. The thought of such dignity is an astonishing and overwhelming conception, but nothing less than this is God's ideal for man, if I read the Scriptures aright.

But the distance between inception and completion is greater here than elsewhere, not only because man is destined to rise higher than other creatures, but also because he begins lower. It is a well-known fact that the young of the human species is inferior in strength and activity to the young of many of the lower animals. True, we walk round the cradle of the sleeping infant with soft and reverent step, and this is fitting. Heaven itself looks down on human infancy with reverence. I doubt if it is too strong to say that God stations a quaternion of guardian angels at the four corners of every little crib in the land. But the reverence with which we regard the child arises from a prophetic instinct of what the child will be, rather than from any perception of what it now is.

The human baby is the absolute extreme of feebleness, helplessness and ignorance. It cannot stand, nor walk, nor even creep. It cannot think. It does not know. It has no true perception, nor any mental action whatever, apart from what we call instinct. It is utterly without the moral experiences—without love, without hate, without hope, without faith. Though belonging to the Kingdom of God, it knows as little of God as Herbert Spencer used to insist he and the rest of mankind knew. It is nothing but a bundle of unconscious organized life, with inherent capabilities not yet manifest. It hasn't ability enough to recognize itself, nor will it ever have memory enough to remember itself at this stage of its being. Were it not for that first miracle of Providence in human life—the mother's love—it would perish from the earth on the day of its birth.

But wait a little and see. Wait until the mother's fostering care, and the father's disciplinary training, and the instruction of the schools and the churches, and all the various appliances of Christian civilization have wrought their vast part in connection with the universal law of development and progress—and then observe the child, now become the man. How wonderful and indescribable the result! That little child now stands erect and surveys the high places of the earth. He climbs the heights, and, walking with God on the horns of the mountains, he surveys the heavens. He counts the stars and calls them by their names. He knows he is superior to suns and systems. His heart thrills with pulsations that are mightier than ocean currents or solar influences. He sees. He knows. He understands. He reasons. He feels within himself the mighty mastery. He calls out to God, and God answers him. The scepter is already in his hand, and the crown is in sight that the Son of Man Himself will soon place on his brow. Henceforth he is king, and alive forevermore, with a life that will rule the world and conquer death.

Such is the law of progress which is here applied to the church, both collectively and individually. We are here solemnly commanded to rise up and seize our inheritance. Never before in all the ages was there such a concurrent blast of trumpets from all quarters of the globe calling the church to go forward. Let the columns form and the march begin.

"I Gave Them Myself."

Said a mother to me one day: "When my children were young I thought the very best thing I could do for them was to give them myself. So I spared no pains to talk to them, to read to them, to teach them, to pray with them, to be a loving companion and friend to my children.

"I had to neglect my house often. I had no time to indulge myself in many things, which I should have liked to do. I was so busy adorning their minds and cultivating their hearts that affection that I could not adorn their bodies in fine clothes, though I kept them neat and comfortable at all times.

"I have my reward now. My sons are ministers of the Gospel; my grown-up daughter is a Christian woman. I have plenty of time now to sit down and rest, plenty of time to keep my house in order, plenty of time to indulge myself, besides going about my Master's business where ever He has need of me. I have a thousand memories of their childhood to comfort me. Now that they have gone out into the world, I have the sweet consciousness of having done all I could to make them ready for whatever work God calls them to do."—Life and Faith.

Covering Sins.

There are two ways of covering sin—man's way and God's way. You cover your sins, and they will have a resurrection some time; let God cover them, and neither devil nor man can find them. There are four expressions in the Bible with regard to where God puts sins:

He puts them behind His back. If God has forgiven me, who shall bring a charge against me?

He has blotted them out as a thick cloud. You see a cloud to-night, and to-morrow there isn't a cloud to be seen.

He casts them into the depths of the sea. Some one has said, "Thank God that it is a sea and not a river; a river might dry up, but the sea cannot." The greatest blessing that ever comes to me this side of heaven is when God forgives me. Have you been forgiven?

The fourth expression is that He removes them as far as the East is from the West. Do you know how far that is? Perhaps some good mathematician will figure that up.

"If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." Then make sure that you are forgiven.—D. L. Moody.

Principles of Morality.

Possibly there is too little attention given by the leaders of religious thought to the relations of sin to society and to impressing the duty of abstract righteousness upon all classes of men. It is not sin in its relation to God that we mean, but sin as it affects man's value to himself and to society—the sociological aspect of a violation of God's law. There are some men who can be reached only in this way. Sin against God has no terrors for them. The thought of future accountability does not appeal to them; but its temporal consequences, its effects on civil and social life and upon the sinner himself, may, if rightly presented, have a deterrent influence. The world to-day is blinded by vicious ideas of right and wrong. Sin, in some quarters, is less obnoxious than a breach of social etiquette. Iniquity is justified in many quarters if it can be made to pay. But society is safe only as correct principles of morality dominate it, and correct ideas will come only through leaders of religious thought.—United Presbyterian.

Wrong Acting From Wrong Thinking.

In China a man is required to mourn three years for the death of his father, 100 days for the death of his mother, and not at all for the death of his wife. Indeed, a Chinaman would feel disgraced if he showed any sorrow on account of the death of his wife. This tells its own story of life in a heathen country with a civilization thousands of years old.—Reformed Church Record.

Simplicity.

Simplicity is the crowning jewel of all virtues. Great messages, great truths, great discoveries and great events are ever simple in their elements. Simplicity makes the great nobler and lifts the obscure to places of eminence. It is the bright charm of innocent childhood and the radiant gem of the old and learned.—Maxwell's Talisman.

Two Keys.

The law and the Gospel are two keys. The law is the key that shutteth up all men under condemnation, and the Gospel is the key which opens the door and lets them out.—William Tyndale.

"A FOOL AND HIS MONEY IS SOON PARTED."

WHAT DO YOU THINK

Of a white man who is arrested for consorting with lewd negro women in a place of public amusement?

PLEADING THE BABY ACT.

The banner-man is whining about some one who he says is abusing him, and he a sick man, too. Well, our advice to the banner-man is to keep his vileness pent up within himself until he gets well, and then go and have it out with the one who abuses him so dreadfully. Poor little thing. But don't vent your petty spite on any one and then do the baby act and say you're sick when they get back at you with some home truths.

NEW COTTON.

The new crop is reported from several points as being about ten days ahead of last year. Selma received her first bale Friday from Boguechitto. It classed as low middling and brought 12 cents. Montgomery's first bale from her tributary territory was brought in Saturday morning by J. H. Higgins, of Lowndes county. It weighed 480 pounds, classed middling and brought at auction 11 cents. J. C. Carter, of Montgomery county, brought in a 610-pound bale Monday morning to Montgomery, which brought 10 3-8 cents per pound on Tuesday.

AN IDEAL NOMINATION.

The republican state committee will meet September 15th in Birmingham, and will put out candidates for certain state offices, notably one for chairman of the railroad commission. The Hon. W. W. Wadsworth, of Autauga county, has been mentioned for that position, and he would indeed be an ideal candidate, for he is worthy of the highest place in the gift of our state. Mr. Wadsworth is a native Alabamian, an ex-confederate soldier (and a good one, too), a successful business man, one who is well acquainted with the transportation problem, and has not prejudged the cases that would be apt to come before him in that office. A well balanced, conservative, impartial man, who is a republican because he recognizes that the principles and policy of that party (in the main) are the best for the material interests and general welfare of our whole county.

DO YOU KNOW?

The writer in last week's Banner who skulks behind the signature of "Young Dem" is a COWARD and a LIAR, one of the meanest of liars, for he uses a grain of truth to a ton of lies. It is true about being in jail, but the dirty scoundrel says "placed there on a charge that pity for a human being keeps me from mentioning here." This human hyena and ghoulish assassin knows, if he knows anything, that the cause of imprisonment was a refusal to make an excessive peace bond of $500. It's not being in jail that is the disgrace, it is what you go there for. From St. Paul's time down to the present good men have endured imprisonment rather than submit to injustice. We repeat that "Young Dem" is a LIAR and a COWARD, and dare him to come out and shows himself in theopen, where such a vile blackguard as he is can be treated as he deserves.

ELECTION OF COUNTY BOARD OF EDUCATION.

Pursuant to call, the chairman of the school districts met in Clanton on the 13th inst. to elect a county board of education. Fifty-nine districts out of a total of sixty-six in the county were represented. A higher standard of citizenship could not have been collected from all parts of the county than this body of men represented. The importance of the work elicited an active interest from every one; none seemed to be actuated by any other than the highest motive. Rev. W. J. Armstrong was called to the chair. G. L. Speer was chosen secretary. On motion the names of delegates were placed upon roll and the convention proceeded to business. After some delay in lively discussions upon duties and qualifications of the board and upon methods of selecting them, a motion finally prevailed to elect from the county at large. The following gentlemen were placed in nomination: J. L. Ruffin, G. L. Speer, R. A. Rasco, W. O. Perry, H. L. Davis, V. J. Gregg and L. A. Calaway. On ballot, the following, receiving the highest vote, were declared elected by the chair: G. L. Speer, Maplesville, R. 1; R. A. Rasco, Thorsby; H. L. Davis, Clanton, R. 2; W. O. Perry, Stanton. On motion the secretary was requested to submit the proceedings of the meeting to the county papers for publication. G. L. SPEER,
Secretary.

BETHEL SCHOOL DISTRICT.

The health of our community is good. Cotton is being injured by excessive rain. The rainfall for the twenty days has been nearly double that of March, April, May and June of this year. Corn is reasonably good, especially corn on bottoms that was not planted late. We are proud to state that our district trustees have secured the services of one of the best teachers of our county, Professor H. A. Harris, to teach our school another year. Caleb Wood visited Walter Sharbutt Saturday. James A. Mims and family went to Prattville Saturday. Messrs. D. E. Knight, Oscar Knight and John Baswell have returned from Sylacauga.

FARMER BOY.

Citizens Will Soon Be Able to Secure Rural Free Delivery.

Thorsby, Ala., August 15.—(Special.) The board of county commissioners has inspected and received the bridge built across Yellow Leaf creek at Salem by Contractor Bean. The commissioners were requested to have the bridge built by several citizens who are desirous of getting rural mail delivery along the road.

F. G. Williams and Supervisor Pipes of the Louisville and Nashville railroad, went to Birmingham today to see Superintendent Starks and present a petition for a station at Bice's coaling on the Louisville and Nashville railroad.—Age-Herald.

Benson, Aug. 15, 1904.

Editor Union:

Please allow me space to reply to the Banner in regard to the ring. I want to say to him that he is right; there is a ring now and Lewis is in it, and the Banner and all the rest of the dems this side of hades can't break it. The ring I refer to was made on July 26th and there is a great chain to that ring and that chain is composed of good populists and republicans, and they are not going to burst at all and Lewis will still be in the ring after November 8th. The only thing that I can think of that is going to burst in November is the Banner. As far as any other ring is concerned, there has been none, for if there had been, some one would find it out besides the democrats. Now, boys, that is just a trick to try to stir up strife among us, and it is not worth noticing, so I'll close, hoping to hear from some of the other defeated candidates.

Yours truly,
W. F. DE SHAZO.

Stanton, August 12, 1904.

Editor Union:

The dems have about blowed off their infernal gas, and now the election is coming on. Of course we are going to elect Teddy, "but" the dems won't believe it. Bro. Democrat, you are a sure goner; you've hollered nigger till your voice is getting weak and your throat is sore, but every short while you can hear a little dem from behind a stump squeak out "Nigger, nigger." Ha! ha! little man you are enough to scare the hind legs off of a white billy goat. Let me tell you something. We republicans don't want to see this beloved and free country of ours ruled by a set of democratic pirates, hence we are fighting for the people's rights and victory is ours. "By their fruits ye shall know them." What are the fruits of the democratic administration? Go ask those who suffered from the 15,242 failures in 1893, with liabilities aggregating $350,000,000. Ask the two million tramps who were roaming over the country of desolation begging for a crust to eat. Now, Mr. Demmie, we don't want another administration like you gave us, and we won't have it if the people's votes are counted anything in the coming election, for we have two republicans and populists to one democrat. So away with the Parker and Davis pirate crew and give us Roosevelt, the best president we've had since Washington. Hurrah for Teddy!

A TRUE REPUBLICAN.

Rushton, Ala., August 8, 1904.

Editor Union:

Please allow me space in your valuable paper to express my appreciation for the support I received in the recent primary and also to thank those with whom I came in contact during my canvass for their generous hospitality. I can not find words to express my gratitude as I feel it, but will say that from the very depth of my heart I thank each and every one that gave me support in any way. Now let us all come together and elect the entire ticket in November.

Yours respectfully,
L. A. CALLAWAY.

Thorsby, Ala., Aug. 15, 1904.

Editor Union:

Please allow me space in your paper to reply to some things said about me in last week's issue of that libelous, dirty sheet called the Banner published at Clanton—once the organ and advocate of the people's rights and interests, but has long since condescended to the venal service of the same old vile crew about Clanton that try to constitute themselves into political bosses of the people of this county, who are now and ever have been the deadly enemies to any man or set of men who dare to oppose their nefarious tricks and schemes, and this reveals the whole secret of the various low, cowardly, lying attacks on myself and others, such as appear in that low, dirty, filthy tirade over the assumed name of "Young Dem," and in the opinion of all honorable, intelligent people that article is the product of a caucus council of the Clanton ring, and I put the challenge right here to any one individual who will dare to publicly reveal his name that I can prove him to be a low-lived, cowardly, lying scoundrel who has been selected to contribute such rot as that contemptable piece indicates for the sole purpose of dragging the issues of politics to their own low contemptable level, they being without character or credit themselves, they have nothing to lose in that way.

But I want it understood that I do not class all the people of Clanton as being of that low grade, for I know that there are as good, high-toned, honorable people there as you will find anywhere and I shall ever feel under the deepest obligations to them for the unmeasured kindness snown to me and mine while living in their midst when myself and family were stricken with long protracted sickness, and the assertion that the good people would regret to have me again to live among them is a pusillanimous lie, and the imputation that I owe honest debts that I will not pay is another lie of the same caliber. I am honest enough to acknowledge that I do owe some honest debts that I have not been able to pay owing to sickness and other misfortunes that I could not control, but do not deny the obligations, and am and have been struggling and working with all my might to repair my misfortunes and discharge every obligation that I owe to any man, but why parade a man's misfortunes to the public? I only ask every honest, fair-minded man to consider the fell and sinister motive that prompts any one to stoop to such low, contemptable tactics. They are snaky, vile, villainous and furnish absolute proof that the opposition to the people's ticket find themselves in desperate straits by resorting to such methods. Let us look on the other side of the question and consider how the straight, honest people regard me, those whom I have lived among longest and know me best. In my home beat I got almost the entire vote. Out of 133 cast I received 119 and I will say that as to the damnable lie about a trade ticket, that some fools are talking, that there never was a more damnable lie set afloat and nobody but a fool or scoundrel tells or talks such rot, and I challenge any pusillanimous cur to tell me to my face that I ever had anything to do with such a thing or that the ticket nominated was the result of such methods. I am sure there never has been a fairer contest held in Chilton county or any other county, for the voters were utterly untrammeled and voted freely as they pleased for the man of their choice, unbiased by any influence other than that of their own free will and judgment, and I repeat emphatically that the individual who claims otherwise is either a fool or a low, contemptible liar, so it is up to you, whoever you are, and you know where to find me. You hear! Just let me tell you that any scoundrelly beast who thinks he can scare, bulldoze or intimidate me has a job on hand that he will be sick of before it is finished.

Some pious, gentle reader may think that our language is too harsh and severe, but they must consider that we have a reckless, devilish, unscrupulous set to deal with, and we are forced to fight the devil with fire, which I for one regret, but I did not make the conditions and am forced to deal with things as they are and want to say to all voters who oppose organized democracy that you will never regret standing by those whom you have selected on this ticket. We realize that every possible scheme will be used to defeat us, but I feel sure that the people of this county have seen and realized enough in the past not to be deceived or rattled by any schemes they may employ. But you may be sure it is going to be a time to try men's souls, but we defy them and will meet them on every turn, so let every fellow be true in his place. Our fight is for right and these things are but the test of what is in a man after all. The lines must be drawn, and we are in for the whole war.

Yours for the right,
L. B. POUNDS.

COOPER.

Editor Union—A short time ago I wrote a letter to the UNION in reply to an article in the Banner, and as said Banner writer, like all of the democratic papers, speakers and writers uses the word "nigger" as a scapegoat for their sins, I asked him a few questions and asked him to answer them from an unprejudiced standpoint, and as he could not do it without showing that the democratic contention against Roosevelt and the negro is a piece of arrant demagoguery, I guess he got the Ring at Clanton to take it up for him. So this "young dem" starts out and says among other blatherskite, that the democrats did not hear Jennings; but, young buck, the evidence is against you. If we were in court I think it could be proved on you. You said Cleveland did not waltz with Fred Douglass, you knew you were lying when you said, "A. M." said so. Then young dem asks why Reynolds, Pounds and Bice were nominated in place of some other candidates. Anybody but a fool would know that it was because they got the most votes, so cut this out and stick it up some place and look at it until you learn something. Any writer who will evade fair questions by assailing the characters of good men, shows that the same spirit that existed in the days of secession, when if a man said that he believed our state should stay in the union, he was taking out and shot or hung until he was dead, and I say that the same old party spirit exists today. Just look around, there's Judge Honeycutt, Judge Adams, Reynolds, Pounds, and everyone that raises his voice against this political oligarchy here in the south. The democratic newspapers of the south don't publish the opinion of their fellow democrats, if such opinion is not in accordance with the political rings and cliques that lay around court houses, cross roads and grog shops, and if any respectable democrat will call on Mr. A. C. Smith, he will tell you that he wrote a piece expressing his sentiments, after the democratic primary, and sent it to the Banner man, who would not publish it because it did not have the "Ring of Corruption" mark on it. I've not the letter of Smith's, but I get my information from a reliable source. In conclusion I'll say that this base, vile writer says I want office, but will never get it, but will only be happy as a tiller of the soil, and he speaks true ring doctrine, for you know they don't want any man to hold office, except a chosen few, such as lawyers, doctors, fiddlers and liars. "Young dem" I guess you thought you were speaking of the democratic party, but I've heard good democrats of our town say it was as vile a piece of rot as they ever saw in print. Such cowardly attacks on our candidates only strengthen them in the opinion of good men, and will elect them in November and bury such characters as you are, too deep for resurrection. Success to the UNION and all the people's nominees.

ABOUT REGISTERING.

Extracts from the general election law of Alabama:

Section 2. The following persons shall be disqualified both from registering and voting: All idiots and insane persons; those who were by reason of conviction of crime disqualified from voting at the time of the ratification of the constitution on November 28, 1901; those who have been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted of treason, murder, arson, embezzlement, malfeasance in office, larceny, receiving stolen property, obtaining money under false pretenses, perjury, subornation of perjury, robbery, assault with intent to rob, burglary, forgery, bribery, assault and battery on wife, bigamy, living in adultery, sodomy, incest, rape, miscegenation, crime against nature, or any crime punishable by imprisonment in penitentiary, or for any infamous crimes or crime involving moral turpitude; also, any person who has been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted as a vagrant or tramp, or of selling or offering to sell his vote or the vote of another, or of making or offering to make false returns in any election by the people or in any primary election to procure the nomination or election of any person to any office, or of suborning any witness or registrar to secure the registration of any person as an elector, provided that any person who is disqualified from voting by reason of conviction of any of the offenses mentioned in this section, except treason, whether the conviction was had in a state or federal court, has been pardoned, may be restored to his citizenship with right to vote by the governor, approved by the board of pardons and specially expressed in the pardon.

Sec. 7 1-2. The following persons and no others, who, if their place of residence shall remain unchanged, will have, at the date of the next general election, the qualifications as to residence prescribed by section 1 of this act, shall be qualified to register as electors, provided they shall not be disqualified under section 2 of this act:

1st. Those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who are physically unable to work; and those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who have worked or been regularly engaged in some lawful employment, business or occupation, trade or calling for the greater part of the twelve months next preceding the time they offer to register, and those who are unable to read and write, if such inability is due solely to physical disability; or,

2d. The owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of forty acres of land situate in this state, upon which they reside; or the owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of any woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of real estate situate in this state, assessed for taxation at the value of three hundred dollars or more or the owner in good faith, in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith, in her own right, of personal property in this state assessed for taxation for three hundred dollars or more; provided, that the taxes due upon such real or personal property for the year next preceding the year in which he offers to register shall have been paid, unless the assessment shall have been legally contested and is undetermined.

Sec. 15. Any elector who registered prior to January 1, 1903, who has changed the county of his residence shall be registered on application on production of his certificate, unless he has since become disqualified.

Sec. 16. When the certificate of any elector who was duly registered has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, on application stating that the certificate has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, and verified by affidavit, and it appears of record that such applicant has been registered, the judge of probate of the county of registration or the secretary of state shall issue to the applicant a certificate that he was duly registered as an elector Such certificate shall be issued free of charge to the elector. The secretary of state shall at the expense of the state furnish the judge of probate blank certificates for use as provided in this section.

The certificate of the registrars or the judge of probate or of the secretary of state shall be sufficient to establish the fact of such registration.

Be sure and register when the registrars are in your beat, as the only excuse for not doing so is by reason of sickness of yourself or in your family, or by absence from the county. Everybody can register this summer who will be qualified by residence or age by the 8th day of November. Poll tax paying has nothing to do with registration; you can register now and pay your poll tax afterwards, but you can not vote unless you are both registered and have paid your poll tax (if any is due). The period of residence necessary to register is two years in the state, one year in the county, and three months in the beat. If you have moved from one beat to another in the county less than three months before election day, you can vote in your old beat, so you don't lose your vote by changing. Any one who desires to register property qualification should with him his last assessment and tax collector's receipt in the registrars as proof that possessed of such property taxes on it. You can register ANY of the following heads

1. If you own 40 acres or more in this state, and reside upon

2. If your wife owns 40 acres or more land in this state upon you reside.

3. If you own real estate in this state that is assessed for taxes $300 or more.

4. If your wife owns real estate this state assessed for taxes $300 or more.

5. If you own personal property this state assessed for taxes $300 or more.

6. If your wife owns personal property in this state assessed for taxes for $300 or more.

7. If you can read any section of the constitution of the United States.

Don't give up your right to vote that you get registered, you only have to show it to the registrars in case you have moved from some other county.

THE UNION will cheerfully give information on any special point on which they may be in doubt and will be ready to help any one to secure the rights he is entitled to under the laws of Alabama. If you think you are entitled to register and the registrars should refuse you, take a couple of good men with you to hear the witnesses as to such refusal and the reasons given by the registrars, thereby be enabled to take your case up to higher authority.

Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Logan have a brand new girl at their home, born Tuesday morning, the 9th inst. Mother and child both doing well, so Dr Hayes says.

R. M. Johnson, now of Indian Territory, but formerly a member of the firm of Johnson & Varner in Clanton, is back here on a visit. Brother Johnson likes the new territory very well.

The democratic nominee for chancellor of this district, Hon. H. J. Gillam, died suddenly last Friday at Alexander City. The democratic committee has not decided yet how they will fill the vacancy. If a primary is held the talk is that the Hon. Richard Kelley will run.

W. T. Mahan was in Clanton Monday, though he was beat in the race for commissioner he made a great run; carried his home beat solid, something not often done by candidates.

Regular services at the Methodist church last Sunday were conducted by the pastor. Rev. R. R. Ellison, who preached morning and evening to fair congregations. His sermon in the morning on "Education" was especially commendable and to the point, and Clanton people do sure need to be educated on that subject.

The board of directors of the Farmers' Mutual Insurance association in this county held a meeting in Clanton Monday and issued a call for the annual meeting of the association to be held in Clanton on September 3d. The officers whose duty it is to send out these notices have, through carelessness or neglect, failed to do so, and the directors are taking a hand.

A CARD.

Editor Union:

Please give me space in your paper to thank my friends for their support on the 26th and to inform Mr. Atchison that I've not committed suicide, and the reason Mr. Sid was too good to kill me was he didn't know how. He reminded me of the darkey that went to kill an eagle. The bird was too sharp for him, so he killed a grasshopper and took it back to his master, who saw that was the best the darkey could do, so he patted him on the head and said: "Hurrah for Uncle."

Sid saw he couldn't get round the question I asked him, so he jumped on the poor fellows that hadn't paid their politax and gave them particular h—l, and the dems that stood around saw that that was the best he could do and they almost blistered their hands and tore their throats hollering "Hurrah for Bowie." Well, W. Y., you said my friends butchered me on the 26th. I admit that, but they didn't make a democrat out of me. I hoped to rest a while, but you dems just punch me and I'll turn over in my grave and haunt you every time you punch. The people informed me on the 26th that they didn't want me to make this fight, but if you dems force it on me I'll get some of you by the leg before it is over. Again thanking my friends for their votes and assuring them that I have not departed from the faith, I remain as ever

CARTER IS SURRENDERED.

Charged With Perjury, Sureties Retire From Bond.

Henry C. Carter, charged with perjury in the United States court was yesterday surrendered by his bondsmen and incarcerated in the Montgomery county jail by order of United States Commissioner John A. Elmore.

Carter, it will be remembered, is the white man of Chilton county accused of falsely testifying in a moonshine case in the commissioner's court. He was confined in the jail for forty days, but was a few weeks ago released on bond. His bondsmen, a few days ago had reason to believe that he was contemplating "jumping" his bond. They accordingly surrendered him yesterday.—Montgomery Advertiser.

LONESOME VALLEY.

Our farmers are very busy pulling fodder and trying to save it between showers. We've had a deal of rain the last couple of weeks. G. S. Eiland says he's been looking for Noah to come floating by in his ark. C. N. Dennis on Monday took out 150 pounds of section honey. Lee Kicker is in better spirits since the return. Elder J. W. Howell filled his regular appointment at Bethel last Sunday. Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Smith, of Thorsby, were welcome guests of C. N. Dennis, Sunday. J. L. Lunsford was a visitor at the Driver residence on Sunday. Oscar Mims and wife, of Birmingham, have been visiting relatives in this community. Miss Ina Eiland has a new graphophone, and gave a very pleasant entertainment with it Saturday night. Joseph W. Simzen was a prominent attendant at church Sunday. Success to the Union and its many readers.

BLUE JAY.

PLEASANT GROVE.

Everything lovely in this community. Crops are good. The church has had a revival, in which the Pastor, Rev. J. H. Thomas was assisted by Rev. Thomas Maroney. We're always glad to welcome Mr. Maroney to this community, as his early life was spent here and it's like home coming to him. Prof. Speer has a large school here Harry Honeycutt and family have located here. We are expecting a telephone line from Jemison to W. E. Thomas' store. Mr. and Mrs. Wright have been visiting near Lomax. Politically, Pleasant Grove is all right. We've a nice lot of young republicans and don't think they'll ever be bought under the lethargy and bondage that prevails in certain parts of our south land to her great detriment, we mean the lethargy and bondage of democracy. We hope this fair land of ours will never witness democracy in power again, for we remember the bitter fruits of the last democratic administration. Neither do our democratic friends want a repetition of their last administration, for they are enjoying these prosperous republican times, particularly our cotton raisers. We believe the Banner is enjoying the present prosperity, notwithstanding it talks for Parker, still if our memory serves us properly, the Banner asked the question during the democratic administration, "What Kind of Clover is this that Grover is Giving Us?" Again, when the Banner alluded to the people's primary as a "Pea-pulls Primary" we don't think that sounds pretty when we remember that it originally bore the name of the "Peoples Party Banner"—But the Banner seems to be rapidly going the way of the "Chilton View." Some of us remember way back when Judge Honeycutt was first brought out for judge of probate by the people, the attitude of the "Chilton View" towards us, and the present attitude of the Banner towards the same independent spirit that now exists among our people seems to resemble the View very much. Well, the primary is over and we've nominated a good ticket from head to foot and these independent people of Chilton will elect it. But who are the real victors in the recent contest? Is it the successful candidates No, it is such true men as Thos. Adams, Wells Littlejohn, Edwards, Kicker, Killgore and others who manifest their heroism by standing bravely by the nominees of the people. Pleasant Grove will do her duty. She has long possessed an independent spirit and her noble young men and beautiful young ladies will continue in the same way. Success to the UNION.

Song Time.

When the robin calls good morning
And the thrush's note is heard
In the distant, dewy woodland,
Like the spirit of a bird;
When the world is just awaking
To the beauty of the day—
Then, O love, my heart makes music
In a lover's roundelay.

When the golden sun has vanished
And the swallows settle low,
When the daylight seems returning
In the flushing afterglow;
When the fireflies light their lanterns
And the mist is on the dell—
Then, O love, my heart makes music
In a lover's villanelle.
—William Wallace Whitelock, in New York Herald.

WHEN LOVE IS DONE • BY GARRARD HARRIS

(Copyright, 1901, by Daily Story Publishing Co.)

She looked across a shimmering waste of barren sand and withered buffalo grass, from which the heat-waves radiated until the distance was hazy with them. A few distorted cactus plants reared their weird forms in the heat, and here and there a dead and parched mesquite bush helped to break the monotony of the scenery.

Afar off, to the southwest, the tops of the mountains in Old Mexico could be seen faintly, miles and miles away. She liked to speculate on how pleasant it was beneath the trees on their slopes—where the cool waters flowed, the wild flowers blossomed and the birds sang.

She was tired and utterly weary of the whole business. Four long years she had lived here—she married John Hawkins back in the states, and came out to the El Dorado ranch, where he was going to make his fortune raising cattle. He was only foreman and she was cook for the cowboys. The worst of it was, she was regarded by him as scarcely more than a cook. He would come home late at night, gulp down an enormous supper, tumble in bed and snore like a grampus until daylight, when he would bolt his breakfast and start out on the range again. Not a word of sympathy, of fellowship; not a bit of tenderness, no sentiment, only work, work—left to herself, her lonely thoughts and the gloomy contemplation of the dreary waste without.

Sometimes he was away at night—and she had heard him joking with some of the cowboys about Rita—and then he would watch her covertly out of the corner of his eyes to see if she heard, or understood. But she did not betray herself, and they went on talking of ———, where the mescal and the music and pulque, and women drove men mad. That was where Rita stayed. Rita was, perhaps pretty and dainty. Well, maybe Rita did not have to cook—cook, all the time for a lot of men, and wash dishes and sweep up and prepare for another meal when one was finished. That would take the good looks away from anybody.

And when John had talked of coming west, she had dreamed of cool adobe houses with splashing fountains in the patio—of orange and lemon trees in blossom—of great scarlet geranium trees and vines and flowers—an indolent, easy "manana" sort of existence. But this, instead. She looked about the rough plank house in utter disgust and weariness.

What was the use of it all? What did it amount to? What was there to look forward to, except a continuation of the drudgery? And day by day her youth, her good looks were slipping from her, ground into nothingness by toil of an unremitting sort. What was there left for her, now that she had found out the base clay of her John—now that love was dead? She remembered a little verse she had read somewhere, in her more impressionable days, and there was a refrain running through it at the end of each stanza:

"—and the light of a whole life dies,
When love is done."

It kept ringing in her ears, just that much of it. She could not recall the rest of the lines.

perspiration from her red face and frowsy brow.

"Oh, it's you, Rafael? Sit down."

"Yas, Senoora, it me. Senor 'Awkins, 'e tell me to tell yo' he goner Fronteras on er business—he not come back for day or so."

"All right, Rafael. Make yourself comfortable as you can; Lord knows it's mighty hot here." She liked the Mexican. He was always the quintessence of politeness to her—anticipating her every wish, and treating her with the deference of a princess.

He was the only one of all the men who seemed to remember that she was a woman, and was hungry for sympathy and attention—that she was more than a cook. Something impelled her to turn and look at him. He was fanning himself with his sombrero, and looking at her with a glance that was unmistakable. He sprang to his feet and took one of her hands, wet with the greasy dish water.

"Senora Helen—I lofe yo—dam my soul, but I lofe yo', ah, so much. Yo' so good, en so kind, en sweet, en so hard worked, en yo' Senor 'Awkins, he doan' lofe yo no mo'—he lofe dat fandango senorita down at Fronteras."

"Rafael—, stop, you mustn't talk that way." Her head spun a little. It was the heat.

"Senora, I lofe yo'. I lofe yo' t'ree year. I not make yo' cook, en cook,—dam de cookin', come en go—vamos, wi' me, I'll mek de peons do de cookin'. I got big 'dobe house way down in Durango, cool, nice 'dobe house wiz what you call him—squirt water up in the patio or de ferns. En de orange, en de feeg, en de rose trees all 'bout de house—it so cool, en shady. I got land, heap land, en cattle. I only stay 'roun' hyar 'cause I lofe yo'. Yo' come en I get de padre to marry us—de padre 'way down in Durango—he know no deeference if Senor 'Awkins be live. Ef yo' say so I go keel Senor 'Awkins?" He had his arm about her now, and with the other hand he smoothed the damp hair back from her forehead tenderly.

"No—no, Rafael, that would never do. But are you sure that you would love me always, and not make me cook—and not be mean to me, and not make me stay at home all the time and work—and you would not love any fandango girls?"

"No—no—I hope de good Gawd sen' me to hell w'en I do not lofe yo'. I lofe yo' always—always, an' I treat yo' as bes' I kin. Come on—I catch a pony for yo' en we get way, way down in Durango to my home, en 'Awkins he never find us. We get der in week. Come Helen—come les' go now, now, down dere de mountains are so cool—en I lofe yo' so!"

She listened to him. As he spoke she thought of the purple mountains in the distance—of the shimmering blue Pacific waters—of a lifetime's dreams unattained. She was not old—and when she had a rest and some new clothes she would be better looking. Insensibly, she knew that her heart had already turned during the toil marked months to this "Greaser"—this Mexican gentleman. At last she bowed her head. She thought of all she had lacked, and from the withered wastes of a heart from which love had faded, there blossomed anew the flower of hope.

"I will go with you, Rafael," she said, simply.

As the sun went down that evening its ruddy rays gilded a man and a woman on horseback loping steadily, swiftly, toward the mountains in the purple distance. There was a light on each one's face brighter than that of the sun—the light of a great love.

"Well, I reckon she's vamosed for the states. It was pretty tough on a gal ter keep her out here in this derned shack, cookin' all the time. Oh, well, she can have her fling, and some of these days I'll go back after her and dress her up fine and be nice to her to make up for it all. Then she'll forgit all about her troubles.

"Come on you fellers, we've got ter go ter Fronteras ter git some supper—besides, my little Greaser gal is anxious ter see me. I'll set up the drinks first—I'm dry as this damned sand. Where's the old woman? Oh, damfino. Gone back to the states, I reckon. Come on."

BEE HUNTING A PASTIME.

There Is a Fascinating Charm About It.

Some bright young women who spent last summer in a western Massachusetts town, tired of hunting birds which never sat still, turned bee hunters. Discovering a veteran bee hunter and overcoming a feminine distrust of the little insect who so sharply resents interference with her affairs, they were initiated in the art of lining bees, and thereafter every tramp afield was with an object in view.

Bee hunting possesses a charm peculiarly its own and it can be practiced wherever flowers grow, even within the limits of a town. The necessary outfit consists of a box three inches square and as many deep. This is divided into an upper and lower story by means of a slide. The cover is fitted with a glass window. In the lower compartment is placed a piece of comb filled with a syrup of sugar and water. The slide is pushed in place and the nearest flower bed or clover patch is sought. With the box in one hand and the cover in the other, it is an easy matter to trap a honey bee busy robbing a flower of its sweets. Watching her through the glass window, the moment she quiets down the slide is gently drawn. It does not take the bee long to discover the syrup, and she at once begins to load up with this treasure.

The box is now placed on a post and a sharp watch maintained. Presently the bee is sated, and, circling for her bearings, starts straight for the hive or tree. When she comes back, for she will surely return, she will bring another bee with her, and in turn this one will bring a third, and so on until a line is established. Then, while one or more fill with the syrup, the cover is replaced and the box carried forward along the line of flight. From the stopping point a new line will be established as before. Thus in time will the bees lead straight to their home.

Hope On, Hope Ever.

Hope on, hope ever; though to-day be dark,
The sweet sunburst may smile on thee to-morrow;
Tho' thou art lonely, there's an eye will mark
Thy loneliness and guerdon all thy sorrow!
Tho' thou must toil 'mong cold and sordid men,
With none to echo back thy thought, or love thee,
Cheer up, poor heart! thou dost not beat in vain,
For God is over all, and Heaven above thee—
Hope on, hope ever.

The iron may enter in and pierce thy soul,
But cannot kill the love within thee burning;
The tears of misery, thy bitter dole,
Can never quench thy true heart's seraph yearning
For better things; nor crush thy ardour's trust,
That Error from the mind shall be uprooted,
That Truths shall dawn as flowers spring from the dust,
And Love be cherished where Hate was embruted!
Hope on, hope ever.

Hope on, hope ever! after darkest night,
Comes, full of loving life, the laughing morning;
Hope on, hope ever! Spring-tide, flushed with light,
Aye, crowns old Winter with her rich adorning.
Hope on, hope ever! yet the time shall come,
When man to man shall be a friend and brother;
And this old world shall be a happy home,
And all Earth's family love one another!

This Bath Good For Insomnia.

Here is a simple and available recipe—a medicinal bath for the nervously worn and those who cannot sleep o' nights. It was the prescription of an old physician. Take of sea salt four ounces, spirits of ammonia two ounces, spirits of camphor two ounces, of pure alcohol eight ounces, and sufficient hot water to make a full quart of the liquid. Dissolve the sea salt in the hot water and let stand until cool. Pour into the alcohol the spirits of ammonia and camphor. Add the salt water, shake well and bottle for use. With a soft sponge dipped in this mixture wet over the surface of the whole body. Rub vigorously until the skin glows. When nervous or "blue" or wakeful do not omit this bath. The rest and refreshing that follow will amply repay the effort required to prepare it.

A Fearsome Monster.

A Texas steer fell overboard from a coastwise steamer the other day and swam for miles before succumbing to old Neptune. He was observed through the glass of a Jersey hotel proprietor, who straightway notified the press of sighting "a mysterious, horrid sea serpent of a dun hue and with the tail of a lion, which wallowed frantically amid the waves, spouting columns of water from its mouth like a whale." The season is said to have opened auspiciously for that ingenious boniface.

A Chilly Mule Tale.

A correspondent with the Tibet mission tells a mule story: "Mules, apparently, do not die from any cause, and this mission has again proved the extreme hardihood of these animals. When the mission first crossed the Jelapsia, a mule slipped in the dusk and fell into the lake at the bottom of the pass. It was thought to be drowned. Next morning a convoy found it with its nose just above the ice, the rest of its body literally frozen in. Pickaxes were brought and the animal was dug out. It is now working as usual."

AN ADEPT AT GIVING ADVICE.

Story of a Man Who Knew His Failings.

Penpusher had come home from the office "played out." He was lying on the couch in the sitting room after dinner, when Mrs. Penpusher, who had been reading a magazine, said:

"See here, Tom Penpusher, here is something that fits you to a T, and I want you to read it."

"What is it about?"

"It's about men who must have everything just so in their homes, no matter how hard it makes it for others. You know you are one of them. Every rug and chair and hook must be exactly in its place, and a little dust sets you to scolding. You must have a clean napkin every meal, and you cannot eat if there is a tiny spot on the tablecloth, and everything must be served just so or you get grumpy. Now, is not that true?"

"A man likes to see things in order in his own house," said Penpusher.

"Of course he does, and I try to keep things in order, but I defy any woman to maintain the degree of order you expect with four or five children in the house. Now, this article refers to just unreasonable, fussy men as you are, and it is not one bit too severe even when it says that they are small spirited and lacking in true manliness. I do wish that you would read the article."

"I don't need to," replied Penpusher, sitting up to stretch and groan.

"I'd like to know why not?"

"Because—well, the fact is, my dear, I wrote that article myself."

CHANGE COCKTAIL WROUGHT.

Life Changed From a Barren Waste to an Iridescent Dream.

They stood, a man and a woman, in the gallery, looking down on the glittering throng of dancers on the floor below.

"What was I saying to you a moment ago?" asked the man. "That is, before I went out?"

"You were saying," said the woman, "things that made me sad, even in the midst of all this gayety. You called it a painted glare—you spoke of all those women down there, each hugging in the secret recesses of her heart some supreme sorrow, some cloying unrest. You were wondering to what depths of remorse, within the next year, each might reach. You spoke of the men; how haggard some of their faces were. You said the pace was too much for some of them; death and disaster and ruin hung over this throng like a grinning skeleton. Really it has given me the shivers. Don't you remember what you said?"

He turned and looked at her. There was a look of complacency on his face.

"Did I say all that," he replied, "before I went out? Well, well! You must forgive me. It isn't so. Why, see how they are all enjoying themselves! What a magnificent sight! What a grand thing is life! How this music thrills me! My friend, it is good to be alive."

She looked at him in astonishment.

"What has changed you so in such a short time?" she exclaimed. "Why, before you went out——"

He waved his hand.

"Things are different now," he said. "I've just had a cocktail."

Ways of the Orient.

There is nothing very remarkable in the report from Japan that a movement is on foot, supported by many eminent men, to found a church pro-Christian in character, but independent in its lines. When Buddhism was disestablished and disendowed in the early '70s of last century, owing to the momentary ascendency of Shiuto, which is merely vague ancestor and nature worship, it was prophesied by acute foreign observers that Japan would either adopt Christianity or become frankly materialistic. It will not be owing to any lack of energy on the part of European and American missionaries if the former course is discarded. Here is one forecast published fourteen years ago: "To make all Japan Christian by edict some fine morning is not on the program of the Japanese statesman of the hour. But that something of the kind should happen within the next twenty years is not nearly so unlikely as many things that have actually happened in this land of realized improbabilities."

The Lesson of the Birds.

I sometimes think, when sorrow makes a feller sorter moan,
Of the birds that keep a-singin' just like trouble was unknown!
I make no doubt they have their grief—
as bitter as the rest!

That Mockingbird there, in the blooms, is making holiday,
Yet vandal hands have wrecked its home—
have stolen its young away!
That little lodge of straw is mute, where chirped its tender brood,
Yet how it sends its song to God—and life a solitude!

But just let trouble come along, and human hearts they sigh,
And send their wailing messages a-ringing to the sky!
The world is then no friend to grace—a shadow dims the light,
The stars shine through a storm of tears,
and phantoms fill the night!

For all our souls, heaven-gifted—for all
our human words,
We read life's sweetest lesson in the music o' the birds!
And the kind God teach that lesson, when skies above us frown,
To leave the moaning to the winds and sing the sorrow down!

Japanese Paper at the Fair.

The Japanese-American Commercial Weekly is the name of a newspaper published weekly in Japanese at the world's fair. Hajima Hoshi is the editor. Nine Japanese reporters and native typesetters get out the weekly. The paper was formerly published in New York city, but was transferred to the world's fair for the joint purpose of making an exhibit of a Japanese newspaper plant in the palace of liberal arts and reporting the fair.

The Old Log Cabin

Before me in its beauty lies the prairie,
And the cloud above a swiftly passing train,
The trees upon the distant hills are waving,
A summer haze is resting on the plain;
Yet memory recalls a fairer valley,
And a spot within it dearer far to me,
A grassy knoll beside a winding river,
Where a little old log cabin used to be.

When daylight dies behind the distant mountain,
And the mist has hid the valley from my sight,
Then memory returns to scenes of childhood,
And on life's summer morning sheds its light.
The sunlight glimmers out upon the water,
Where, undisturbed, the minnows sported free;
The dreamy years but added to their number,
Where the little old log cabin used to be.

The world, to us, was bounded by the forest,
That stretched away, we recked but little where;
The winter but foretold a brighter season
When roses gave their fragrance to the air.
In spring there came the children's songs and laughter,
The squirrel scampered up the nearest tree
And chattered to the wildly barking collie,
Where the little old log cabin used to be.

The bob-o-link, above the clover blossoms,
Sang o'er again his song of summer joys;
And "Bob White," from his perch beside the meadow,
Kept watch upon the collie, and the boys.
Along the crooked pathway to the river,
The twittering blue-bird and the chickadee
Flew in and out among the ferns and willows,
Where the little old log cabin used to be.

The timid deer looked in across the wheat field,
The partridge hid her fledglings in the brush,
The voice of Robin Redbreast, in the orchard,
Was mingled with the singing of the thrush;
The crow and marten quarreled o'er the clearing,
We wondered why they [illegible] agree—
The hardest problem of [illegible] hood,
Where the little old [illegible] be.

And wearily we lay [illegible]
What will we care [illegible] glory?
What matter if [illegible] frown?
Leave what remains [illegible] out body
High on a mount[illegible]
But let my longing [illegible] der
Where the little [illegible] be.

Aye, let the daisies [illegible]
The fragrant lilies [illegible]
The giant maple shade [illegible] way
Inviting every [illegible]
There let the panting [illegible]
And listen to the [illegible] glee;
For backward on [illegible] heaven,
Where the little [illegible] be.

Lost Coins in Mails

Ordinarily no man is rich enough to escape that certain sense of elation which comes from picking up a nickel on a sidewalk; but when a railway postal clerk finds such a coin in a mail pouch where it has worked out from insufficient wrappings, not only does he miss this elation, but it may provoke profanity.

For a nickel lost in a pouch of mail in transit becomes a matter for national concern. It comes to view, perhaps, just as a pouch of mail is emptied upon a sorting table; and when it has broken away from the bunch of letters and cards and circulars, rolled to an open space on the table, and there settled down, heads or tails, with a noisy spinning dance, the clerk who first sees it is "it."

A necromancer could have no more idea than the man in the moon as to what particular package it rolled out of, and if he had and should tell the postal clerk, the clerk wouldn't dare try to restore the coin to the original package. That would be too easy altogether.

No, it is a lost nickel from the moment the clerk has to see it spinning there before his eyes; and according to the tender governmental conscience the clerk [illegible] for the inauguration of [illegible] worth of fuss over it.

Tale of the Armada

Three hundred and fifteen years ago a vessel of the Spanish armada was blown up in Tobermory bay, off the coast of the Island of Mull. Recently numerous relics have been recovered from it by divers. They include old cannon, swords, pistols, plate and coins. The vessel was the Florencia, a Florentine galleon which came from the Levant, one of the Italian possessions of the king of Spain, and was commanded by one Pereija. After the defeat of the armada the Florencia was forced by bad weather and lack of provisions to put into Tobermory bay. There Sir Lauchlane MacLean, who, because of his feuds with his neighbors, had been made a "denounced rebel" by King James of Scotland formed an alliance with the Spaniards. With the aid of a hundred soldiers from the ship and of his own war on neighboring clans for some time.

At last he received a message from Capt. Pereija requesting that the Spanish soldiers be sent back at once, as he was preparing for sea. How to Catch Bears

The inhabitants of California in the days of Mexican rule had a unique way of capturing the black bears that infested the foothills near the coast.

Bruin is naturally a vegetarian, but when he can get a piece of fresh meat he devours it greedily. The Mexicans knew this and prepared their trap thus:

An oak tree was found with two horizontal limbs, one above the other. On the lower limb a piece of fresh meat was nailed. From the limb above a rope was suspended, at the end of which a heavy rock was attached, the rock hanging some inches above and inside of the meat.

At night Mr. Bear would come prowling around and, smelling the meat, he would quickly climb up the tree and walk out on [illegible] which it was nailed. [illegible] to reach the appetiz[illegible] would have to shove [illegible] with his nose. Before [illegible] be torn off, the [illegible] back, hitting Bruin [illegible]

This [illegible] get "real mad" and [illegible] rock until it would [illegible] hard enough to knock [illegible] tree. Underneath [illegible] deep hole to catch [illegible] would so disable him [illegible] completely at the [illegible] cans next morning.

CROP PROGRESS.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Climate and Crop Bulletin of the Weather Bureau—Alabama Section—For Week Ending August 15, 1904.

General Conditions.

Rather cool, continued wet weather made the week, as a whole, unfavorable for cotton and maturing corn; the rainfall was heavy over the greater portion of the state, and excessive in some southern and middle counties; in some central counties, considerable lowland corn and cotton were damaged by overflow. Continued wet weather has caused cotton to deteriorate considerably, especially in middle and southern counties, where rust and rot are prevalent, and where shedding is becoming serious; in many fields full grown bolls are dropping, and in some places the plants are yellowing and shedding leaves; in some northern and western counties the crop continues to fruit satisfactorily, but over the state, as a whole, the condition of the crop has been lowered somewhat during the past two weeks; bolls are opening slowly and very little has been picked. While corn has been damaged slightly in some fields by continued wet weather, a very good yield of corn seems assured; some early corn has been gathered in southern counties. Fodder pulling has been retarded by wet weather, which has damaged some of this forage. All minor crops continue promising; some early sweet potatoes and ground peas are being gathered, with good yield; sorghum and hay are generally promising, though dry weather is needed for saving these crops. Pears are yielding well, though this fruit and grapes are still rotting from excessive moisture. More turnips have been sown, with much of the early sown up to good stands.

The prisoners had been tried and sentenced to hang September 9th, but the mob learned that the soldiers' guns were unloaded and the prisoners were taken from the guard.

Bryan Loses.

A decision adverse to William J. Bryan in the contest over the will of the late P. S. Bennett was handed down. The decision virtually denies that Mr. Bryan is entitled to the $50,000 mentioned in the sealed letter written by Mr. Bennett and addressed to his widow to be read by her after his death. By this letter the widow was asked to give $50,000 to Mr. Bryan and his family.

CHARTER FILED.

Charter for the Cambria Southern railroad has been filed. This line runs from Wetmore on the Atlanta, Knoxville and Northern railroad to the Georgia state line near the point where the Canaussaga river crosses. Charter will be sought in Georgia for the road to run from this point to Cartersville on the Western and Atlantic road. This is the new through line of the Louisville and Nashville road to the south. Large shops will be erected at Camden, Tenn.

Radium Discovered.

Radium ore has been discovered at three different places in the Cripple Creek district. At two places the ore has been found in a well-defined vein, averaging from eighteen inches to two feet in width. Thousands of dollars worth of the precious ore has been thrown over the dumps by the people operating mines in the sections referred to, because they did not know that it had any value.

YACHT TURNS TURTLE

And Ten Persons are Drowned While Watching Races in the Potomac River.

AND THE SPORT CONTINUED.

They Had Come to See the Regatta and Were Not to be Disappointed by Tragedy.

Ten persons were drowned as the result of the capsizing of a naphtha launch on the Potomac river off Georgetown during the annual Potomac regatta Saturday afternoon.

Four others who were on the launch escaped. All but one of the dead lived in Washington.

The capsized launch was the Recreation and carried the fourteen people mentioned. During the first race the launch got in the way of the eight-oared shells, and its wash was such that the regatta officials reprimanded its crew and ordered them out of the way. There was some show of resentment at this order, and the launch headed for the shore, but miscalculated its course, and striking the strong undertow, caused by a mill race, rocked for a moment, and as the passengers rushed to one side, turned turtle.

Many of the spectators, including the officials in charge, declined to stop the sport, saying it was inexpedient because people came from numerous other cities to take part, and the regatta was the result of long laid plans in which many outside interests were concerned. There was a great deal of criticism of this decision.

The cheering for the competing crews as they passed the scene of the tragedy, and the shrill and deafening whistles of the pleasure craft continued while the bodies of the unfortunates were being grappled for, dragged into view and sent to the police station.

MAY INVOLVE UNITED STATES.

Japanese Breach of International Law Affords Grave Situation.

The report of the capture by the Japanese torpedo boat destroyers of the Russian destroyer Ryeshitelni in the harbor of Che Foo as conveyed to Washington was received with deep interest and also concern, for it was realized that there was in this incident the germs of serious international trouble.

If the expedition was a genuine cutting out one, then there is no question in the minds of the officials that the Japanese have committed an offense against international law by violating Chinese neutrality and in addition have broken the agreement they entered into at the beginning of the war at the instance of the United States government to limit the field of warlike operations to Manchuria and Korea and their waters. Should this prove to be the case, the results probably will be grave and vexatious. Under the tenets of international law the captured vessel must be returned for the offense against Chinese neutrality. But if Russian lives have been lost as reported in the press dispatches, a greater complication will follow, for Russia may in turn hold China responsible for the punishment of the Japanese who caused the death of her sailors when under the shelter of Chinese port authorities.

The British officials and foreign diplomats regard the action of the Japanese in cutting out the Russian torpedo boat destroyer Ryeshitelni at Che Foo as raising a serious question of importance to all nations.

Back to France.

The United States customs department has received notice from Santos-Dumont to pack up his airship for reshipment back to France. The boxes containing the airship are at present in the Brazilian pavilion at the world's fair.

Compresses Leased.

The Dallas Compress company, the new concern which has taken charge of the two Selma compresses, has concluded a lease for five years with the Gulf Compress company. The Gulf Compress company and the Atlantic Compress company operate practically all the presses in Alabama, Tennessee, Georgia and Mississippi. C. C. Hanson, of Atlanta, is president of both companies. The common report is that the railroad interests of the south control both concerns. The lease of the Selma presses provides that the city shall not be discriminated against and that no extortionate prices shall be charged. The old employes will be retained.

August 1st pig iron production had fallen to 246,092 tons per week.

Cotton in Mississippi.

Cotton crops all over the middle of Mississippi are suffering greatly from the heavy rainfalls of the past several weeks, and those of the delta have been damaged to an alarming extent. Thousands of acres of some of the delta plantations are completely covered by water. No work has been done on some of the farms for many days, and if the rains continue much longer there will be a marked falling off in this year's yield.

M. WALDECK - ROUSSEAU DEAD.

His Cabinet Served Longer Than Any Other. Was an Authority on Legal Matters.

died Wednesday afternoon as the result of an operation.

Pere Mare Erneste Waldeck-Rousseau was born at Nantes, France, December 2, 1846, and was a son of Rene Waldeck-Rousseau, at that time a prominent member of the assembly. Waldeck-Rousseau studied law at Saint Lazare, where he practiced for some time before settling at Rennes. There he made his first entrance into politics, being elected deputy in 1879. He was considered one of the most prominent orators of the assembly.

His best work was for the reform of the judiciary. He was re-elected on August 21, 1881, and on November 14 of the same year, although only 35 years old, was admitted into Gambetta's cabinet as minister of the interior. The short-lived ministry of Gambetta did not offer him a fitting chance to prove his ability at that time. The resignation of the governor took place January 26, 1882. Having been offered the same portfolio in Jules Grevy's cabinet, he held the same from February 21, 1883, until the resignation of M. Grevy's cabinet in February, 1885. In 1886 he was elected senator, although he was not present at the election. In 1889 Waldeck-Rousseau was entered at the bar of Paris and since then pleaded some of the most important cases of the time. He also favored a revision of the Dreyfus case.

On June 22, 1889, Waldeck-Rousseau was called upon to form his ministry, and after having been successfully in office for over three years he resigned in June, 1902, his ministry having the longest duration of any cabinet under the republican regime. He was also a writer of eminence on judiciary matters.

INJURED BY RAIN.

Reports From All Over the Country Say Too Much Moisture.

The weather bureau's weekly summary of crop conditions says:

Weather conditions during the week ending August 8, as a whole, were less favorable than in the previous week. The central and east gulf and Atlantic coast districts suffered from excessive rains. Generally sufficient rainfall has offered relief in Texas. Over the central and western portions of the corn belt, corn continues promising.

Reports of rust in spring wheat continue general in the Dakotas and in portions of Iowa and Minnesota, and indicate the crop has been greatly damaged. Harvesting is in progress in southern Minesota.

Generally well distributed rains have benefited cotton in Texas, but in the central and eastern portions of the cotton belt the crop has suffered from excessive moisture, many of the fields being grassy and of too rapid growth. Rust and shedding are reported from nearly all states east of the Mississippi. West of the Mississippi, with the exception of Louisiana, the crop is in a good state of cultivation and complaints of rust and shedding are less numerous than in other states.

CAPTURED WOLF HILL.

Japanese Cannon Now Command Port Arthur Harbor.

A dispatch from Lieutenant General Stoessel, commander of the Russian military forces at Port Arthur, confirms previous reports that the Japanese before Port Arthur are in possession of Wolf Hill. The general says that on July 30, the Russians withdrew from their position on Wolf Hill, before the numerical superiority of the Japanese.

White Wolf Hill, and a hill to the westward of it were strongly fortified. It would appear from the maps available that long range guns of the Japanese should command the harbor of Port Arthur from White Wolf Hill.

General Stoessel estimates the number of Japanese attacking Port Arthur at 70,000.

Will Rebuild the Road.

Contract has been awarded to rebuild the Atlanta, Knoxville and Nashville railroad from Knoxville to Wetmore, Tenn., a distance of sixty miles. The contract involves about $2,000,000. The work is a part of the plan of the Louisville and Nashville to complete its through line from Cincinnati to Atlanta by way of Knoxville.

The contract is to be completed within ten months. Mr. Oliver will at once put three hundred teams and several hundred men to work on the job.

Bridge for Montgomery.

The Montgomery Bridge and Road company was incorporated Friday with a capital of $100,000 and $37,000 paid in. The purpose is to build a foot and wagon bridge over the Alabama river.

Carnegie Steel Company lays off Men.

The Carnegie Steel company Tuesday served notices on all the clerks in the Southern Sharon office that after September 1, their services would not be required. The reason given is that the blast furnace construction is completed and no other department of the big works will be operated. This will mean the closing of the open hearth steel department which employs 2,500 men when running full time.

SEEKS $3,000,000 DAMAGES.

George Rice Alleges That Standard Oil Company Ruined His Business.

George Rice, of Marietta, O., commenced suit in the United States circuit court for $3,000,000 damages against the Standard Oil company for the alleged ruining of his oil business by the defendant company.

Rice charges that the Standard Oil company compelled him to charge his customers exorbitant freight rates; that the company opened grocery stores to break down his competition, and in other ways succeeded in taking away from him 4,000 customers, an oil refining plant worth $750,000 and a business worth $50,000 a year.

This suit is brought under the interstate commerce act of 1890, and is similar in character to one entered in the court or chancery of New Jersey by Rice in which he seeks to compel the revocation of the company's charter under the laws of New Jersey. While the damages claimed are $3,000,000, the actual amount is $1,000,000.

MOB KILLS NEGRO

Who Had Shot the Town Marshal of Cordova.

City Marshal J. C. McNelson, of Cordova, while attempting an arrest was shot and almost instantly killed by Ed Avery, a negro. The negro was captured and placed in the city jail and a mob overpowered the city officers by breaking down the doors of the jail, secured the prisoner and killed him with bricks and pistols.

Mr. McNelson had been on the police force scarcely two months. He was reared at Cordova and was well known and liked by the entire community.

Town Marshal McNelson went to the house where the negro lived to collect 25 cents due the town of Cordova by the negro, and the negro shut the door in the marshal's face, whereupon he knocked again for admittance. He was answered by the negro opening the door and shooting him with a pistol.

TESTIMONY COMMENCED

The hearing of testimony in the Louisiana-Mississippi boundary dispute commenced Thursday. Louisiana is represented by Mr. Zacharie and others, while Mississippi is represented by Attorney General William Williams and ex-Attorney General Monroe McClurg. It is not likely that any more hearing of testimony in this case, which is one of the greatest ever launched in Mississippi and involves vast sums of money, will be held at Jackson, but there will be several more meetings yet, the next one taking place in Louisiana to last for two or three weeks.

Brighton's Progress.

Preparations are being made to begin work on the new water works system at Brighton. Arrangements will also be perfected in a few days with the Birmingham Railway, Light and Power company to furnish the town with electric light.

The new waterworks company was organized with a stock of $10,000, all of which is composed of home capital. Brighton was incorporated about three years ago and since that time the population has grown until it numbers over 1500.

The Brighton water works company will get its water from Parker Springs, an unusually bold spring near the city. The elevation is higher than most of the town and a fine pressure can be gotten without going to very much expense.

Unrestricted Passports.

The United States government has again formally proposed to Russia the opening of negotiations for the unrestricted recognition of American passports. In accordance with the law of the empire, only foreign Jews, of specified classes—merchants having business connection in the country, etc.—are allowed to enter Russia, but quite a liberal policy has been pursued in making exceptions to the rule where legitimate reasons therefor are given. The exceptions, however, are seldom made in the cases of Russian Jews, who have been naturalized abroad. The inhibition is not against the United States alone, but extends to the Jews of every country.

Populists Notified.

Thomas E. Watson, of Georgia, the populist leader, and Thomas H. Tibbetts, of Nebraska, the candidate for vice president, were formally notified of their nomination Thursday night at Cooper Union.

Mr. Watson opened with the statement that there was never a time when the plain people of America were more dissatisfied with the conditions which prevail in this republic.

After a formal notice that he would soon prepare a formal letter of acceptance, Mr. Watson gave up a great portion of his address to a discussion of the democratic and republican platforms and the candidacy of Judge Parker.

DEATH AND DAMAGE.

Cyclone Strikes Minnesota's Twin Cities. Fifteen Persons Killed.

GREATEST LOSS IN THEATERS

Total Property Damage Estimated at $3,000,000—Path Eight Miles Long.

Five reported dead, twenty injured and property loss estimated to reach $2,000,000 are the results of a fierce tornado which swept down on St. Paul, Minn., about 9 o'clock Saturday night.

The Tivolo theater was demolished, the Empire theatre razed, the high bridge, an immense steel structure crossing the Mississippi river at a height of 200 feet was almost totally destroyed and 244 buildings are more or less damaged.

A report at midnight is that the House of Good Shepherd, a Catholic institution, was wrecked and twenty-five injured. All communication with outlying districts is cut off and it is impossible to say whether or not the damage there has been as great as that done in the city.

The property damaged at Minneapolis is said to have been nearly as great as at St. Paul. The storm was of short duration lasting not more than fifteen minutes.

The wind according to the government observer blew thirty miles an hour coming from the southwest. Buildings were unroofed and blown in, the interiors being flooded by the rain which came in great waves along with the wind. Electric wires were prostrated and many persons injured by contact with the current from electric light and trolley wires.

An excursion steamer towing a barge on the river below St. Paul is reported to have been wrecked. Relief parties in steam launches have been dispatched to the rescue.

Wm. Donaldson & Co., big department store in Minneapolis was badly damaged by the storm. The loss is said to be $300,000. Later reports from Minneapolis are to the effect that no one was killed but many were injured.

The Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha round house building collapsed. Five engines and a steam wrecker were damaged. Numerous cars were blown from the track. Damage estimated at $20,000.

LATER—Fifteen people were killed in the fierce tornado which overwhelmed the twin cities and which wrought devastation in other parts of the state. The aggregate property loss is placed at $3,000,000. Of this St. Paul suffered to the extent of about $1,000,000. Minneapolis' damage estimated at $1,500,000, while in the outside districts it is feared that $500,000 will not cover the damage.

Both the Tivoli concert hall and Empire theater were fairly crowded with men watching the performance. Both theaters stood on the edge of the bluff overlooking the river, with the sides of the buildings open, and were wrecked. The full force of the tornado struck them.

DYNAMITE EXPLODED.

Two Persons Killed and Three Injured by Shock of Explosion.

Two persons were killed and three injured, two perhaps fatally at Minden, Mo., by the explosion of fifteen cases of dynimite piled on the Missouri Pacific depot platform being struck by a freight engine. The depot was completely demolished.

The engineer, fireman, station agent and his wife were either killed or fatally injured.

The dynamite was consigned to a mining company. It had been unloaded carelessly and had been on the platform for two hours when a southbound freight train struck a case that projected over the tracks. A terrific explosion followed. The depot was wrecked and a hole made in the ground large enough to bury a box car while the engine was dismantled and the track torn up for a distance of 200 feet.

Desperate Criminals Escape.

Two desperate convicts, Pearl and Horace Wallace escaped from Rankin convict farm, taking guns with them. They were sent up from Franklin county for twenty years and life, respectively for murder. A reward of $200 has been offered for their capture and sergeants with dogs are pursuing them through Pearl river swamp.

After a severe engagement with the protected cruisers Chitose and Tsushima the Russian cruiser Novik has been vanquished. The fight occurred Sunday, but the details are not yet known.

GRADE CROSSING FATALITY.

Four Killed and Twenty-three Injured. Brakes Failed to Work.

Four people were killed, another fatally hurt, and twenty-three severely injured in a collision between an express train and a train of three trolley cars in Chicago. The train, according to some witnesses of the accident, was running at a high rate of speed. Others and the train crew declare that it was not going over twenty miles an hour.

The trolley train approached the crossing at a rapid rate of speed, just as the train came around a sharp curve to the west of the crossing.

Ryan put on the brakes with all his strength in the effort to stop his car, but the brakes refused to work, and with undiminished speed the motor car ran upon the tracks at the same time that the locomotive came up. The car struck the train between the engine and tender, the motor car was torn to splinters, the car immediately behind it was knocked over, smashed nearly to pieces and dragged along the track for 100 feet. The third car was not dragged from the tracks.

Motorman Ryan remained at his post to the last and was fatally hurt, his skull being fractured.

WILL BUILD LINK.

Southern to Complete Line Between Bessemer and Mobile Junction.

The engineers of the Southern railway are making preparations to begin active operations on the road to run from Mobile Junction to Bessemer. The right of way has been secured with the exception of two short tracts of land. The route has already been surveyed and the maps completed. The company intends to commence on the road in the near future, and rush the work until it is completed. The road will not be hard to build, as it passes over almost level ground, leaving very little grading to be done. When this is finished the Southern will have its own tracks all the way into Birmingham from Mobile. They have been using the Alabama Great Southern track since the Three B division of the Southern was built from Mobile Junction into Birmingham.

SHOT FROM AMBUSH.

Fatility In Mississippi Attributed to a Feud.

A special from Laurel, Miss., says that while W. C. Windham, E. Windham and J. T. Blakley were going home from Tallahala Swamp, about two miles from Bay Springs, Miss., they were fired upon by an assassin from ambush, and W. C. Windham was shot in the breast by a Winchester rifle bullet.

His horse ran about eighty yards, when Windham fell dead. The shooting is believed to be a result of the Ainsworth-Windham feud in Smith county. Sloan Ainsworth having recently been killed by one of the Windhams. There is no clue to the assassin

From Statesboro, Ga.

Captain R. M. Hitch, of Savannah, who was in command of the troops at Statesboro, will demand, so it is reported, a court of inquiry of his conduct, and that of his soldiers.

Captain Hitch in his official report alleged that Sheriff Kenrick and his deputies betrayed all his plans to the mob. The sheriff has entered a most emphatic denial of every charge, and in effect charges the military with neglect of duty. The matter is in a state of rest until the return of Governor Terrell from St. Louis.

BOOKS ARE RIGHT.

But Money is Due the State for Convict Hire.

The books and accounts of the state convict department have been examined by Examiner of Public Accounts George F. Sedberry, and reported correct in all particulars. The examiner found, however, that some of the lessees of the convicts of the state had not been prompt in settling their indebtedness to the state.

The convict department, he says, is using every diligent effort to secure a complete settlement. The largest debtor to the state is the Sloss-Sheffield Steel and Iron company, which owes the state $3,033.40.

Some of the items in the account are in dispute between the board of inspectors and the Sloss company people. These differences are now being considered by the board and an early adjustment of the matter is hoped for.

There is a movement on foot at Corona to make a new county, taking in part of Fayette, Walker and Tuscaloosa.

Twelve locomotives are now being built at the Baldwin works for the Central of Georgia railway.

Coal mines in Missouri, Kansas and Oklahoma Territory are closed because of too much rain.

The Tennessee company has a force of men at work building a new furnace, installing blowing engines, new boilers, erecting brick structures and making a number of other repairs around the Ensley furnaces and steel plant. In addition to this the same company are having fifty new four-room houses built at No. 4 mine.

The rail mill of the Ensley steel plant is now engaged in turning out an order of 30,000 tons of steel rails for the Louisville and Nashville railroad company. For the past several months the mill has been working on double time steadily on the large number of orders that it has ahead. A large order has just been completed for the Southern Pacific railway.

For the first eighteen days of August of this year the rainfall in Montgomery, according to figures of the Alabama section of the weather bureau, was 5.79 inches, while the normal for the state for the whole month is only 4.82. The outlook is that the precipitation for the whole month will exceed the highest ever known, though the record for 1901 was 8.80 inches. The result of the excessive moisture has been very injurious to the cotton crops, which have suffered more than any other.

Dr. Swallow, prohibition candidate for the presidency, summarizes the monetary cost of the liquor industry to the nation—$16.50 to every $1 paid into the treasuries, municipal, state and national—as uncontrovertible proof that the liquor business of the 250,000 liquor dealers in America who last year "filched from the hard earnings of breadwinners $1,400,000," is a constant and serious infringement upon the rights of all our eighty million people.

A Question of Law

Anne is a maid of many moods
From louting up to laughing;
She'll sweetly smile with witching guile
And then torment with chaffing.
To-day she's languorous, soft, and kind,
Tomorrow cold and formal—
And so I can't make up my mind
Which mood of all is normal.

Her hair is gold, her cheeks are fair—
They do not change, you see, so;
Her eyes are blue and soft and true—
At least, they seem to be so;
Yet oft I ask myself, were we
To marry and be done, sir,
Were it polygamy, since she
Is many girls in one, sir?

The bareness of the lofty frescoed room had been relieved by hangings of ancient tapestry where was portrayed in dim green tints, as of sea depths, the story of Circe. Swinging lamps and yellow candles, thick as a man's wrist, in tall, ecclesiastical candlesticks, cast a soft light o'er the sombre antique furniture. Great brass bowls of red roses made splashes of color in the deep shadows.

In a high carved arm-chair, by the open wood-fire a woman sat, listening and waiting. She wore a loose gown of a soft, diaphanous material, whose whiteness was thrown into relief by the mantle of black fur, just slipping from her shoulders. She, herself, was of a strange type of beauty, the clear pallor of her skin, like the petal of a white rose, being in vivid contrast with her jet black hair and dark eyes. She might have served to personify night.

After a time she arose and paced the room restlessly, pausing at the great tapestried bed to turn down the coverlet, and to touch with her lips an instant the violets just beneath the ebony-and-ivory crucifix at the bed's head. Then she drew aside the curtains of a window, and looked out for a moment on the moonlit garden, and on the lights of Florence, far below in the valley. They had lived in the villa already three months, she and her husband, yet in that time they had visited the beautiful city but once. He was absorbed in his chemical experiments, and she was absorbed in him.

She heard his step now in the corridor, and her heart leaped with expectancy. He entered and stood for a moment in the shadow, a youthful figure still, despite his bent shoulders and furrowed brow, and the look of age imparted by the skull-cap and long furred coat which he wore.

For a moment she could not see what he carried in his arms, but she divined from his air of exaltation that his latest experiment had been successful. As he crossed the room, a graceful figure in her long white draperies, he held out to her his precious burden, twelve coal-black roses. She gave a cry of delight.

"Oh, how beautiful! Basil, how did you do it?"

He smiled as he watched her caress the ebony petals with her white finger tips, and brush their soft blackness against the pale oval of her cheek.

"That I cannot tell any one—even you! You wished for a black rose. Your husband is a magician," he went on playfully, "and you have your heart's desire!"

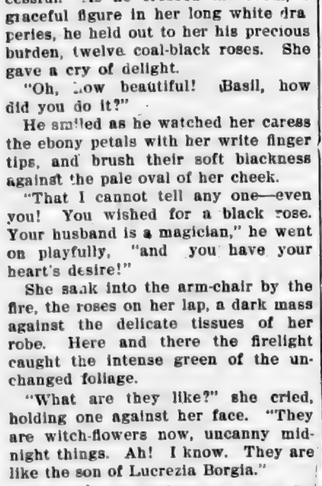
She sank into the arm-chair by the fire, the roses on her lap, a dark mass against the delicate tissues of her robe. Here and there the firelight caught the intense green of the unchanged foliage.

"What are they like?" she cried, holding one against her face. "They are witch-flowers now, uncanny midnight things. Ah! I know. They are like the son of Lucrezia Borgia."

Her husband adjusted the black fur mantle about her shoulders.

"No, no, you must not call them ugly names, sweetheart, for I mean them to personify you. You are a dark rose—with your midnight hair and eyes."

"'Du bist wie eine Blume'? Ah, the poet never thought of such a flow-



"You have your heart's desire!"

er, I'm sure. They misnamed me who called me Rosamond. But tell me, Basil, did you have to mingle a great many poisons to produce this effect?"

"Yes, a great many. But they have annulled each other, though they destroyed the rose perfume in the process."

"The loss is slight. I love them, these black roses. They fascinate me. Suppose I should decorate the wayside shrine with them at the garden gate!"

"The peasants would stone you for a witch, I fear. No, Rosamond, keep them in your bed-chamber."

"I shall put them by my bed now, and ring for Santuzza to take away these other flowers. I want my black roses to reign alone."

She crossed the room, and from an inlaid cabinet took out a fantastically carved vase of rich green malachite in this she arranged the roses.

"How heavy they are! One would think they were overburdened. How well they suit the vase! They shall give me rare dreams! You are not going back to the laboratory? It is past midnight. Isn't this achievement enough for one day?"

"Dearest, I have another experiment still incompleted. Go to your rest and dream of your roses."

He kissed her and went away, his footsteps echoing along the stone corridor that led to the laboratory. She stretched herself upon the bed, and lay for a long time between sleeping and waking, the light from a swinging lamp falling across her face, one heavy black rose just brushing the pure whiteness of her cheek.

What was this in the bed!

Her husband worked in his laboratory until the morning sun was gilding the domes and towers of Florence. Tired out at last, by a prolonged and unsuccessful experiment, he left his work to go to his bedroom. As he passed his wife's room he saw that the door was ajar. He reached out a hand to close it, lest the morning sounds through the house should disturb her; but in the act he caught a glimpse of something by her bed which made him turn faint with a sudden nameless horror. The roses in the malachite vase had become white again, and were gleaming ghostly in the pale radiance of the swinging lamp. Knowing the nature of the poisons imprisoned—he had thought forever—in the black roses, a terrible fear possessed him. In making their escape from those petals, now of innocent pallor, where had they gone!

"Rosamond!" His voice shook as he called her name.

There was no answer.

"Rosamond! Rosamond!"

His tones were now loud and terrified. No answer came from the dark shadow of the bed. He drew nearer, cold with apprehension. Something very black was outlines against the whiteness of the linen. A great horror sickened him. For an instant he paused, shaking as with ague. He dared not go nearer, dared not look. What was this in the bed! By a supreme effort he reached the window-curtain, and pulled it aside. The morning light streamed in, revealing the form of his wife, quite dead, and black as if carved out of ebony.

Do Not Whine.

Someone has said: "Whining is poor business; it identifies you at once as the under dog, and does not get you any sympathy, after all." The man who whines confesses his weakness, his inability to match his environment. It is too much for him. He cannot command the situation. All he can do is to kick and complain. The habitual whiner never gets anywhere, never accomplishes anything.

Cigarette Trust Reaches Out.

The cigarette trust wants to collect $7,500,000 from Mexico for the use of its patented machines.

Directors Were Dumbfounded.

Once there was a rich man—a very rich man—who wanted to do something handsome for a struggling institution of learning.

He called the directors together and said to them:

"Gentlemen, I purpose giving your institution $5,000,000."

"But," they said, after they had recovered from their surprise, "it will be impossible for us to raise the $10,000,000 that will be needed in order to secure your munificent gift."

"You will not need to raise any $10,000,000," he replied; "the donation will be unconditional."

"Then the money will be invested in bonds or real estate, we presume, and we shall be allowed to use the income in erecting new buildings and paying running expenses?" they faltered.

"Not at all," responded the rich man. "The gift will be in cash, to be used in any way you please, and when it is all gone there will be another $5,000,000 at your disposal, gentlemen, if you have spent the first sum wisely."

The directors consulted together in whispers and then quietly sent for an officer.

The man evidently was insane.

Her Reward.

"The brute," exclaimed the bride of a year.

"Have a cup of tea, dear," said her fondest friend, "and tell me all about it. What has he been doing now?"

"You know I told you he has been encouraging me in learning to cook; has praised my nice little entrees, takes me to the theaters as an occasional reward and all that."

"No good ground for a separation in that, I imagine," said the dearest friend, with slight sarcasm.

"Your sympathy is worse than your tea," retorted the bride, who was obviously out of sorts. "But I'm going to tell you, anyway. Not long ago he promised me a surprise if I would turn out a nice dinner cooked all by myself, from soup to coffee. Last night I did so. Everything pleased him.

"'My pet,' he remarked, 'I believe I promised you a surprise on an occasion like this.'

"'Yes, darling,' I answered. 'Oh, do tell me what it is?'

"'I shall discharge the cook at the end of the month,' he said."

One Scoffer Was There.

"Want to see the finest work of art in this place?" asked a French journalist at the Austrian building Thursday afternoon.

We're always wanting to see, so we followed. He led us to a picture all done in greens and blacks. It was that of a girl asleep over a loom. Light seemed to be shining through the green blind that screened the window just beyond the loom.

The color the light took from the blind was on everything in the room—the head of the girl, the cloth of her loom, and the great loom itself.

The effect was as if the picture were on glass behind which shone an electric light.

It is the work of Svarisky, well known in European art circles. We looked; we admired; we talked of the ability of a man who, with two colors only, could do such work.

One there was who disagreed. When our exclamations were done he made but one comment:

"Spinnage."

But he was hushed and hurried away.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Dr. Parkhurst Guided the Guide.

The Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst goes to Switzerland every year for his summer holidays and climbs the Alps. He has many friends among the Swiss guides, whom he warmly admires.

"Only once did I know one of these men fail in his duty," he said to a friend the other day. "I took him to guide me on an ascent, and was much surprised that he did not insist on my carrying a big flask of brandy for the party, as the guides usually do.

"But I soon found out the reason. He was hopelessly drunk already, and after he had staggered half a mile up the slope he sat down on a rock, looking utterly bewildered, and confessed that he didn't know where he was or where to lead me. He had been over the ground a thousand times, but I had to guide the guide home."

Reckon We'll Git Thar Yit.

He wuz always a-sayin', when trouble come roun',
"I reckon we'll get thar yit!
Ain't enough rain for a lily to drown—
Reckon we'll git thar yit!
Its' jest human natur' to growl an' complain;
Ruther have sunshine than oceans 'o rain;
But—spite o' wild weather, I'm tellin' you plain,
Reckon we'll git thar yit!"

An' we carried that counsel the rough way along—
"Reckon we'll git thar yit!"
It lightened the burden—made sorrow a song—
"Reckon we'll git thar yit!"
He wuz only a toiler in bloom an' in blight,
With Hope's star a-shinin', full blaze, in his sight;
But he looked to the light, friends—he looked to the light—
"Reckon we'll git thar yit!"

Student Knew His Bible.

Prof. Theodore C. Mitchill, head teacher of English in the Brooklyn high school, often entertains his friends with stories, the following being one of the most recent:

"I was laying down the law to a lot of fellows in the second," says Prof. Mitchill, "and happened to illustrate my remarks by a Biblical allusion.

"'Keeping you in does no good,' said I. 'I am going to heat the furnace seven times hotter, as they did with Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego. Do you remember their case?'

"'Sure!' said the fresh one of the class. 'And the fire never hurt them a bit!'"—New York Times.

DREAM SERVED AS A WARNING.

Premonition of Danger Undoubtedly Saved a Life.

One of the most striking instances of a warning dream was the story narrated of the late Lord Dufferin, which is, to the best of our knowledge, quite well authenticated.

Lord Dufferin was staying at a country house in Ireland; and early one morning he heard, or dreamed he heard, a sound of wheels approaching the main entrance. He naturally hurried to the window to see what was afoot; and was not unnaturally surprised to see a hearse drawn up before the door of the mansion. He especially noted the driver's face—a very unpleasant one of a smooth pasty complexion. He concluded that a servant must have died suddenly and that the coffin was being removed at this unusual hour in order to cause no shock to any of the guests in the house.

As nothing was said about the matter in the morning, he made up his mind that he had dreamed the whole affair, as was probably the case. Lord Dufferin naturally thought no more of the matter until one day, during his residence in Paris, when he had occasion to visit a friend in one of the large hotels, and approached the elevator to be conveyed to his friend's landing.

What was his horror on recognizing in the elevator attendant the hearse driver of his vivid dream! Declining to use the elevator, he left the hotel, and shortly afterwards he heard that the same day the elevator had broken down, and the sinister attendant was among the killed. Subsequent inquiries revealed the fact that there had certainly been no nocturnal visit of a hearse to the Irish mansion.

Only an Interlude.

Close vines of honeysuckle overhung
The door with hovering sweets;
'Round the white pillars they luxuriant swung
And cooled the summer heats,
And made the narrow way a narrower seem;
So that, in passing through,
You shook the spray upon you, gleam on gleam,
And were baptized in dew.

And, with the morning, to the door she came,
The vines around, above—
A radiant picture in that glowing frame
And atmosphere of love.
She took a tender blossom in her hand,
Toyed with her finger tips,
Then mingled with it, as her mouth she fanned,
The honey of her lips.

And I, a stranger since the night before—
A lover's quarrel ours—
In hiding, watched her standing in the door,
Fairest of all the flow'rs.
I, who so loved her, dared not go to her;
I had been in the wrong.
And sleep had not been mine; my sufferings were
Remorse the whole night long.

I came—she saw me—smiled. We met half way,
Embraced in new-born bliss,
And, of our quarrel had no word to say;
'Twas smothered in a kiss.
You crush a flower—its perfumes will arise
In sweetness for the pain;
So, grieve a woman, and she yields love's prize—
Forgiveness, poured like rain.
—George Birdseye.

The Umpire's Revenge.

"No, Mr. Wilson," said the beautiful girl, coldly, "I realize that you are good and kind and true and noble; that your prospects are bright, and that there would be no objection on the part of my family. I think I might make you a good wife, and I know that you would be kind to me. I have a little money saved up, and with that and your salary for the season we might live comfortably in a little cottage somewhere, where, after the games, you could come home and mow the lawn and work in the garden. It would be pleasant, I admit, but I can never be yours—never, never!"

"Look here, young lady," said the baseball umpire, calmly, "one more such bunch of back talk, and I'll fine you ten dollars for delaying the game."

Then he called "Time!" and went on.

Boy Was in Luck.

Police Commissioner McAdoo relates some amusing incidents which occur in a police court, relieving the general dreariness of the day's doings. Recently a "white wings" and a messenger boy were arrested for fighting over the possession of a bill. "White wings" charged the boy with having snatched it up from the street when he dropped it from his pocket. "What is the denomination of the bill you dropped?" inquired the justice. "One dollar, your honor," answered the man, on a venture. The messenger boy's grin reached from ear to ear as he unfolded in his dirty hand a greenback much the worse for the wear and tear of the scuffle for its possession. It was a ten-dollar bill. The case was dismissed and the boy, turning to the policeman, said:

"I'm glad yer took me in, fer I offered to divide wid him. See?"—New York Times.

Looks Like "Mother Hubbard."

The latest thing in automobile clothes is a "Mother Hubbard" linen duster. It is of extraordinary length and of generous width. In fact, a rear view of it resembles nothing quite so much as one of the old-fashioned "Mother Hubbards."

When the average man who wears one gets out of the car he has to hold it up to prevent walking on it. The ribald small boy has fun with the wearers of these garments, and usually asks if he knows he has his night-gown on.

The nearest thing to the motorist's "Mother Hubbard" in the way of sporting attire is the long white coat worn by the umpire at a cricket match. On any public cricket grounds, such as in Prospect Park, the scoffing by-standers seldom fail to inquire of the umpire: "What butcher shop do you work in?" an inquiry than conveys an excellent impression of the sportsman's appearance.—London Answers.

John L. Their Idol

"When I first went to Tahiti," said a traveler from the South Seas, "I landed on one of the remote islands. The first night I went in state to visit the chief.

"He was a fine old fellow, fully 6 feet 2 in height, and a man every inch of him. I happened to know people who had lived on his island for a time. Through an interpreter he asked me all kinds of questions about them—if they were well, if their hair was getting gray, how much money they had, etc. Then conversation languished.

"At length I heard him repeating to the interpreter a word that sounded like 'Yonelsulwan.' The interpreter seemed to catch it finally. He said: "'He wants to know how is John L. Sullivan? Is he fighting as hard as ever?'"

"'Oh, no,' I said truthfully. 'John L. Sullivan isn't champion any more. He was beaten by a big man from the West, and a man from the Big islands beat that man, and another big man from the West beat him.'

When this was told to the chief he looked me all over and said something in a very positive tone.

"'He tells me,' said the interpreter, 'that he doesn't believe you. He thinks you don't like John L. Sullivan.'

"Everywhere I went on the islands it was the same story. When they found that I was an American [illegible] all asked for John L.

"Some of them knew who was president of the United States, the most of them who had any idea the subject thought it was Cleveland. But every one thought he knew who was champion of the world. In [illegible] al native huts I found [illegible] oloned prints of the Boston [illegible].

Say Jewels Have Life

A Persian princess is now demonstrating the occult sciences of the East in the drawing rooms of the West End of London.

At a house in Mayfair recently this dark-eyed sibyl lifted a corner of the curtain which holds the magic and the mystery of the Oriental from English eyes.

Clad in a loose flame-colored gown with jewels entwined in her dusky hair, and precious stones glittering in barbaric array on her corsage, the princess succeeded in completely mystifying her audience of ladies.

She declared that only the Eastern mind could understand the deep, all-absorbing passionate devotion of a woman for her jewels. The Eastern woman adored her jewels. The life that was within them responded to that love, and they shone with added luster. Precious stones had all a life within them.

Stones had sex, continued the sibyl, and if the male and female were placed together in the wrong way the beauty of the stones would be diminished. Place a male and female diamond, however, in a tightly closed box and at the end of a few years the diamonds would give off little crystals. For this same reason jewelers learned in the lore of the East massed their diamonds together.

Of the opal the princess could not speak without a shudder. [illegible] evil stone and brought [illegible] The stone was really a drop [illegible] from the dews of heaven [illegible] by the rays of the morning [illegible] it was a malevolent influence.

"Never wear opals. Never [illegible] risk—it is too great," said [illegible] cess.

Every one had his or her own particular jewel, and it was a grave [illegible] to disregard its significance.

"How could one find out one's jewel?" the princess was asked.

"By wearing each of the seven [illegible] cious stones for one whole week, keeping a record of the emotions, experiences and at the end of the seven weeks comparing them," was the reply.

If her hearers had been interested in the princess' talk of precious stones, they were reduced to tears when she proceeded to expound the past and future of the ladies in her audience from their jewelry, to interpret their emotions, and to give them warning and advice.

Each lady placed a favorite ring to the little pile of jewelry in front of the clairvoyant. With closed eyes she lifted up the rings and brooches and necklaces, one at a time, with her left hand, for that was the one next the current of life, the heart, explained the princess.—London Express.

One Man's Ideal Woman

There are lots of pretty women and lots of beautiful dolls, but there are none too many really beautiful women, measured by the standard set up at the present day, says the Pittsburg Press.

A beautiful woman, first of all, must have clearly cut, regular features.

She must have a skin above reproach, untouched by rouge or powder.

She must have full, clear eyes, with the eyelashes long and curling upward. Her eyebrows must be finely marked, slightly arched, long and narrow, yet the narrow line should be thickly covered, so as to be well marked, as if penciled.

She must have a straight nose, yet delicate, neither fleshy nor pointed nor broad at the tip, with the nostrils free and flexible, and mouth must be rather too large than too small, with lips full and plump and rosy red. Even an exquisitely shaped mouth has no charm without expression.

Her regular teeth of moderate size, pearly white, with full enamel, should show when she is smiling.

She must have a chin neither sharp nor blunt, but gently undulating line, round and cushiony, turning a little upward, with a dimple in it.

All this must be supported by a round throat, full and pillar-like.

She must have glossy hair that has never known the touch of crimp or dye, and she must fully understand what suits her best in the way of hair dressing, and cling closely to that style.

She must have small, delicately compact ears of shell-like shape.

She must have a forehead of ivory, even white, delicate, short and broad, open, truthful character.

A woman may have all these perfections—be either dark or fair, tall or short, slender or full formed, quiet, piquant, majestic or vivacious, sedate or brilliant—and unless her own personality is charming, unless she has tact, it dawns on you after you have seen her once or twice that she is not a beautiful woman, but a picture.

Such a one—notwithstanding her attraction of face and figure—never becomes the chosen helpmeet and ideal husband. The day of the doll-like damsel is long past.

Complaint of a Lover

A grouchy and crotchety, fussy old man,
Whose stick on the walk beats a rat-a-tat-tat,
The cut of his coat on an old-fashioned plan,
A shiny, red nose and a worn beaver hat,
A blare of defiance, he trumpets his nose,
He clears his hoarse throat with a he-he-he-hem!
But the girl on his arm, she's as fair as a rose,
How grew such a flower on such a gnarled stem!

He bushes his eyebrows and scowls upon me,
His stick with a click beats the walk as we pass,
His scowl wastes the bloom of a smile that I see
And freezes it stiff on the lips of the lass.
He raises his hat with a Chesterfield air,
The sweep of his arm is chill courtesy's sign,
But his eyes pass me by with an unseeing stare,
If blood were for spilling he'd dabble in mine.

There's pride in the white [illegible] so high,
Defiant the tilt of the old beaver,
Contempt in the stare of the [illegible] eye,
And the click of his stick [illegible] rat-a-tat-tat.
He spurns me, he scorns me, he [illegible] me—he knows
I'm nursing in secret some [illegible] plan
To pluck from its parental [illegible] rose
That rests on the arm of this [illegible] man.

So he passes me by with an [illegible] stare,
His cane beats defiantly rat-a-[illegible]
He trumpets his nose with a [illegible]
There's pride in the tilt of [illegible] beaver hat.
Love may laugh at locksmiths, [illegible] and a care
In bridging most gulfs of [illegible] a span

THE REWARD OF GLADIOLA.

In the first place her name wasn't Gladiola at all—it was just Gladys Brown—a common name enough, especially Brown. It was that ridiculous Miss Graham, the history teacher, who called her Gladiola, just to make her more conceited. And she hasn't anything to be conceited about, either. We all knew she didn't pay any fees, but that Mrs. Peel the principal, let her come for nothing, just because she used to go to school with her mother. (I mean Mrs. Peel used to, of course.)

Gladiola thought a whole lot of her hair. Of course she did, or why did she brush it so long every night? I wouldn't have had it as a gift if it did reach below her waist. It was red!

Then we all knew she thought herself smart. What was the use of her pretending she didn't when she took good care to get all the prizes? Mrs. Peel ever let one girl get? You could only get three at that school. If you got three that disqualified you from trying for any more. It always seemed to me it was better not to get any, and then you weren't disqualified. And if you weren't disqualified, what was to hinder you from trying for the whole lot? Elsie—she's my roommate—says I don't see it because I haven't got a mathmetacil—I mean mathematical—mind. Well, I don't want one.

But I don't seem to be getting on very fast, and what I want to write about is the reward Gladys (I'm not going to call her Gladiola), got for not trying for that third prize. Now that was one of the oddest things that ever happened in that school, and it just shows what a crank Mrs. Peel was. She and Miss Graham used to urge us to try—used to say how pleased our parents would be. If you'd a nice, exciting book, and hadn't read your history over nor worked your examples, they were sure to say: "Think how pleased your dear mother would be if you were to win the so-and-so prize." They called it "stimulating their ambition" when they talked to us over. Elsie told me this, for she heard them say it one day.

I forget where I left off—oh, I know. About the prize they gave Gladys for not trying—for not trying! As Elsie said, what did they want to go and do that for, when there were three or four of us who had never tried for any? But none of us got any reward. I believe they wrote "Does not apply" on our reports home.

It was about ten weeks before the summer holidays when she came—Lottie I mean, of course, because the rest of us had been there all the year. She was thirteen, and that was younger than any other girl in the school. She was slow, too, and didn't know. Just one thing she was up in and that was one of Mrs. Peel's fads, too. Mrs. Peel had a good many, but mythology was the first. She used to give us an oral examination in it every other Wednesday. Oh, how we hated it! She didn't give you any time to think, and if you couldn't answer—and they were generally such silly questions that you couldn't—well, she looked at you! So did Miss Graham. So did some of the girls, the studying set. Elsie and I weren't in that. It was at these exmminations that we saw how conceited Gladys was. She always made a point of answering every question. As Elsie said, it was too monotonous. I didn't even listen to them. I don't think it's right to be studying about things that haven't any sense. As Elsie says, we all know these gods never existed at all, and if you learn about them you are learning nothing. That's not what our parents sent us to school for! So, when Mrs. Peel asked about Baldur and Aphrodite and Fricka and Penelope and Persephone, and things like that, I plan out my next new hat.

As Elsie says, we all know these gods never existed at all, and if you learn about them you are learning nothing. That's not what our parents sent us to school for! So, when Mrs. Peel asked about Baldur and Aphrodite and Fricka and Penelope and Persephone, and things like that, I plan out my next new hat.

I was doing that this day, and had just decided upon snowy ostrich tips and palest pink velvet, done into little shells, when Elsie whispered: "Say! She doesn't know! Gladys doesn't know!"

Of course, I left the hat and came back to earth. It was true. Mrs. Peel stood up at her desk, spectacles on nose, and Gladys stood up at hers, and she didn't know. I hadn't heard the question, but I know the answer. For that shabby little Lottie piped up:

"I know, Mrs. Peel. Wotan made her so's she wasn't a goddess any more—I mean a Walkyrie—any more, 'cos he got so mad at her!"

Gladys smiled at her. I call that so hypocritical. No one can like to have anyone else know more than you do. Mrs. Peel smiled, too, and asked the child some more questions. It turned out that she'd been shut up with a lot of old books on mythology, and had read them till she knew them backward. I believe she could have puzzled Mrs. Peel herself. But that was all she knew, though. Her writing and spelling were simply awful.

The prizes were generally books, and stupid ones, too. But this Easter Mrs. Peel had offered for her beloved mythology a pin, a fine cameo—lovely, it was, the head cut in white, on pale, soft tan.

I almost wished that my conscience would have let me study mythology that pin was a duck. I own I should have liked to have it. Of course, it would go to Gladys. She was safe to have the history of the French as well. We wondered if Lottie would try.

Yes, she did. She sent in a note, asking to be a "competty-tawr!" She knew as much or more than Gladys, but the way she pronounced the names! I did a little studying, so as to see what Mrs. Peel and Miss Graham laughed at. She called "Wotan" (which you ought to call "Votahn," you know), "What oon," and all her words were like that. Mrs. Peel used to put her handkerchief on the desk whenever it was Lottie's turn to answer, and she put it over her mouth to hide her smiles. Elsie says teachers always do that—it's traditional with them, she says. One day the question was how Romulus died. Isn't it silly to make you learn how a person died who wasn't ever born?) And Lottie said: "Why, he never died, he didn't! His Paw took him right up to heaven in a buggy! Mrs. Peel snatched up her handkerchief. But we laughed right out. Elsie heard that Mrs. Peel had said Lottie's spelling and writing would spoil her chances for the prize, and that Gladys was sure of it. We took care to let Gladys know. We thought it might make her a little less stuck-up if she knew that only her writing and spelling got her the prize. And that wouldn't have got it, either, only that the papers were to go to an outside examiner. We thought, maybe, she'd withdraw and give the poor little thing a chance. You see, Lottie's knowledge was away ahead of every one's except Gladys's. Her paper would only be about as good as Lottie's, plus writing and spelling. Elsie said she'd have withdrawn in a minute, and I said I was glad I hadn't entered. But Miss Graham's precious Gladiola kept right on. She wanted that pin, of course.

Well, she didn't get it! The examiner wrote back. Elsie heard Miss Graham tell one of the other teachers that Miss Brown's facts were "utterly erroneous," her answers were upside down. I suppose she'd muddled herself studying. I've done that, so I can feel for her. But you never saw any one as odd as Mrs. Peel was, or Miss Graham, for the matter of that. Elsie says, that when the letter came (she didn't know what was in it, of course, but she found out later), Mrs. Peel put her arms round Gladys and said, "My dear, generous child."

Wasn't that silly? But Gladys got served out for being so conceited, and thinking she knew more than we did. She only got two prizes (such a come down for her, who'd always had three) and little shabby Lottie got the beautiful pin! But what surprised us was that Mrs. Peel gave Gladys a smaller one, with the same pattern on it, and Miss Graham had it set as a ring for her. I said, well, if they meant to give consolation prizes, why not begin with those who hadn't any at all, and who had purposely kept out of little Lottie's way? But Mrs. Peel's a crank, as I told you, and I'm going to another school.—Frances Harmer in the New York Tribune.

THE STORY OF OUR SALT.

AMERICA PRODUCES A LARGE PART OF WORLD'S SUPPLY.

The Four States Which Yield the Most Are Michigan, New York, Kansas and Ohio—The Method of Mining Distilling.

America's annual production of salt now exceeds 20,000,000 barrels, which is nearly four times as much as it was twenty years ago. Of this total more than 2,000,000 barrels is table and dairy salt, and more than 7,000,000 barrels common fine salt. The four states producing the greatest bulk of American salt are Michigan and New York each with more than 7,000,000 barrels annually, with Kansas and Ohio next in line, with about 2,000,000 and 1,000,000 barrels respectively, followed by California, Utah and West Virginia. The output in other states is comparatively small.

For a number of years the United States has led the world in the production of salt, comparatively recent figures showing that we produced 23 per cent. of the world's supply. Great Britain came second, then Germany and France. The world's total production exceeds 12,000,000 short tons. Our imports come chiefly from Great Britain, and what little we export goes across the Great Lakes to Canada or from the harbor of San Francisco to the islands or to South America.

Wells with a diameter of six inches are sunk down to the rock salt and are lined with casing pipe. Water is forced down one pipe and comes up in a parallel one, bearing the salt with it. The forcing of the water down the first pipe by means of pumps is necessary because of the weight and specific gravity of the salt which is to be brought up in the other. Of course, water only would soon seek its own level.

Brine thus brought to the surface is conducted by pipes to settling vats 120 feet long, 15 feet wide and built of wood. When free from sediment the brine is then led to vacuum pans, airtight iron kettles from which the air is withdrawn. By means of a system of steam pipes heat is also applied from within. In the vacuum the brine boils and vaporizes at a temperature of 120 degrees. The brine is made to circulate freely within the vacuum pan. With the concentration of the brine the fine grain salt leaves the pan and is carried in its slushy form to the bins, from which place, after draining, it is conveyed to revolving dryers, which are cylindrical in shape and which subject the salt to hot air blasts, the final process in producing salt.

In accordance with another method, in another style of vat, 70 feet long, 20 feet wide and 4 feet deep, with open top and heated by submerged steam pipes, the salt crystallizes upon the surface, later settling to the bottom, and is gathered to one end and taken out by the aid of modern machinery. The drying process is the same as heretofore described.

In other parts of the country, other processes are employed in the production of salt, such as the open air evaporating plans, which provide for acres of sheds covering shallow vats. Salt is secured from the ocean waters by open air methods of evaporation and crystallization. Again, as in Michigan, salt is mined in many respects like so much coal or other mineral and the impurities extracted.

The cooling tower, which a Cleveland salt company erected upon the roof of its large building, is a device which provides for saving water by using it over and over again in connection with some of the operations of salt production. Instead of using a new supply of water for condensing the vapor from the vacuum pans, the water, which has been used is carried to the roof and cooled. The cooling is accomplished by means of a system of troughs, which stand 10 feet above the roof proper. From these troughs many hundreds of thousands of gallons of water daily are distributed upon the roof beneath. When forced to the troughs the temperature of the water is at least 120 degrees. When returned to the pan the temperature is but 60 or thereabout.

Like in so many other industries of this day, there has been a very marked evolution in the production of salt. The per cent. of impurities in the best grades is too small to be worthy of mention, in many instances being less than one-half of 1 per cent. To reach this stage of perfection has required tireless effort, and now, in point of purity, as well as in amount of production, the United States leads. Its purity and its cheapness in this country make salt very common upon the American table, and we use it freely. In some countries it is so expensive in proportion to what it is here that it may almost be classed among the luxuries of the table.

In this country, too, great quantities of the coarser grades of salt are used by the fishing interests in curing fish. For packing purposes salt is in a great many instances almost indispensable. Salt is also used in large quantities in the manufacture of soda ash and other things of this nature.

TROLLEYING IN COAL MINES.

A New Diversion Which People Have Taken to in Missouri.

The trolley has been put to a new use. Out in Missouri, where there are many coal mines, one of the new amusements of people is to ride through the black diamond caves in electric cars.

Incandescent lights are strung along the entire distance, the roofs are high and well supported, the air is clean and dry, and there is no more cause for apprehension than in taking a trolley ride about a large city.

Missourians insist that so far as mining matters are concerned they are in advance of most of the Eastern states. Five or six years ago most of the mines were nothing but holes in the ground, timbered and shored, with two streaks of rust leading into them, and now and then a gaunt mule leading a car out of them.

Now there are dozens of mines in the State and a woman in a white Swiss gown could journey through for miles without getting so much as a scot mark on the hem of her garment.

Two reasons exist for the change. One is that the State Legislature adopted careful laws governing the operation of mines and the other is that the mine operators have found it cheap to use electricity.

Some of the mines employ electricity for power in hauling everything. A few use it on the main entries and still use the mules on the cross and side entries.

These lines are built on the same principle as the ordinary trolley, with the rod running upon a wire strung along the roof. Besides the cars used for carrying coal to the dump, each mine has a passenger car in which the men are taken to and from their work and in which excursionists are taken through the drifts.

Formerly one current of air was thought sufficient to maintain life and health. A means was discovered by which the currents could be split and one carried over the other. Now every large mine has from twelve to fifteen currents constantly circulating through it and the air is nearly as pure as on top.

Invention has yet been unable to find a substitute for the pick and shovel. These are still in use.

Missouri's coal fields embrace an area of about 30,000 square miles. The principal deposits are found in a strip of about fifteen counties running diagonally from the centre of the State southwest into the Indian Territory.

In some counties the vein is but a foot and a half thick, but it seems to be everywhere. One cannot put a spade down into the ground in this territory without finding traces of it.

These mines are all easily worked and as a rule require little expensive machinery and no deep shafts. About two-thirds of the mines are commercial ones, that is, shippers of coal. The others simply supply the local demand.

One reason why there is so much timber in Missouri is that no farmer ever finds it necessary to cut wood for fuel. He can buy coal so cheap at the mines that he prefers to use it rather than go out to the creek and chop down a few trees or some brush.

Besides this well defined coal area, coal rock is found in a dozen other counties. The entire area covers a large part of the State, and active and systematic mining has opened the beds in more than a thousand places along the railroads and near the towns.

Above these coal deposits line thousands of acres of as fine agricultural land as there is anywhere, and the farmer who can't get enough in coal royalties to suit himself can garner big crops and dispose of them at top prices. When his friends come to visit him he can take them on the trolley through the coal mines, even if he has no summer resort handy to interest them.—New York Sun.

Vegetarian Colony in Kansas.

The remark by an Allen county paper about high water in Vegetarian Creek recalls the circumstances of a curious colony located in the valley of this creek in 1856.

It was composed of about one hundred persons gathered from different parts of the East, and all were members of the cult devoted to a vegetable diet. In joining the colony the members were required to make the pledge that they would refrain from the use of meat, tea, coffee, tobacco and other forms of stimulant and live entirely on vegetables and fruits. During the first year, however, there was a great deal of sickness among the colonists and it was observed that the neighboring people who ate everything which came to hand were healthier by far.

Not unnaturally this discouraged the doctrine of vegetables alone, and many left the colony, while others recanted. Of the whole colony the only one who can be called to memory is Capt. S. J. Stewart, State Senator from the Allen county district, and owner still of the original claim which he took in 1856. The remaining memento of the settlement is the name Vegetarian Creek, given to the stream along which the colonists settled.—Kansas City Journal.

Pensioned by City.

Atchison is probably the only town in Kansas that has pensioned a disabled employe. William Hoover, assistant chief of the fire department, has been retired on account of disability after twenty-three years of faithful service, with an allowance of $35 a month.

The Erie Railroad has adopted a noval car for accidents emergencies. It is equipped to render medical aid whenever needed along the road at a moment's notice. A doctor and attendants are constantly in charge.

PORTRAIT OF EMPRESS.

The first portrait ever painted of the Dowager Empress Thi An of China is now on exhibition in the Fine Arts Building at the St. Louis Exposition. It was painted by Miss Kate Augusta Carl, an American artist, who has lived much abroad and whose brother, Francis E. Carl, was chosen as vice-commissioner to represent China at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition. It was while staying in China with her brother that Miss Carl enjoyed the unusual experience of meeting the dowager-empress at a reception given to the women of the foreign legations. Shortly afterward she was invited to the imperial palace and the arrangements completed for the painting of the portrait. During a number of the sittings the dowager-empress and Miss Carl were alone except for the empress' attendants; at other times Miss Carl sat behind a screen and painted the empress while the latter was engaged in receiving the members of the legations or in other social or administrative duties. The portrait is a full length painting. Later it will be placed in the National Museum of Fine Arts in Washington.

FOR THE ATHLETIC GIRL.

The Peter Thompson waist is the correct thing for the woman fond of sports. It is about to put the shirt-waist out of business, so far as the girl who plays tennis and golf or who sails a boat is concerned, and, indeed, it is finding great favor with those who go in for nothing more strenuous than steam yachting or holding down a rocking chair on a summer hotel verandah.

The newest fad in waists is nothing more or less than a blouse that slips over the head exactly like that worn by the naval reserves, and has a gathering string in the bottom, which ties snugly about the waist. It is built of cotton or linen duck, coarse or fine linen or of a coarse cotton material resembling sail cloth, and a short skirt always goes with it.

A smart sailor collar and hand embroidered insignia on shield or sleeve give the finishing touch. This has many advantages over the shirtwaist. It is quickly put on and off, stays in place and gives wonderful freedom in swinging a tennis racket or a golf club.

WASHED FACE IN MILK, BECAME WRINKLED.

A writer on beauty in one of the society papers urges her readers never to wash the face with soap and water, as being certain destruction to a fine complexion. I cannot indorse this view.

Cleanliness is absolutely necessary to the beauty and delicacy of the texture of the skin. If soap is not liked, at least oatmeal should take its place, and pure or distilled water invariably be used. I once saw the result of only washing the face with milk in a lady who started life with a good complexion, but before she reached middle age had lost all freshness, and showed a faded skin covered with fine wrinkles. Nothing equals the complexion of the country woman who rises early, is much in the open air and bathes freely in cold water. The homely idea of washing in the dew of the morning as an aid to beauty is simply a practical way of expressing this fact.—Lady Greville in London Graphic.

MOTHER HUBBARDS FOR MOTORISTS.

The latest thing in in automobile clothes is a "Mother Hubbard" linen duster. It is of extraordinary length and of generous width. In fact, a rear view of it resembles nothing quite so much as one of the old-fashioned "Mother Hubbards."

When the average man who wears one gets out of the car he has to hold it up to prevent walking on it. The bald small boy has fun with the wearers of these garments, and usually asks if he knows he has his nightgown on.

The nearest thing to the motorist's "Mother Hubbard" in the way of sporting attire is the long white coat worn by the umpire at a cricket match. On any public cricket grounds the scoffing bystanders seldom fail to inquire of the umpire: "What butcher shop do you work in?" an inquiry that conveys an excellent impression of the sportsman's appearance.

IMPERATIVE CALLS.

It is not only courteous, but imperative, where you have acted as bridesmaid or maid of honor, to call upon the mother of the bride shortly after the wedding, calling upon the bride herself soon after her return from the honeymoon.

Those invited to a home wedding or wedding reception or breakfast must all in due course on the bride's mother—later on the bride herself, says the Philadelphia North American.

It is obligatory to call on your hostess after a dinner, breakfast, musicale or luncheon. The dinner call is of especial importance—for men as well as for women. Whether the invitation be accepted or not, this call must be paid within two weeks' time.

When such invitations as those for dinners or balls are declined and no call follows, the hostess has a right to feel offended and to consider the matter as an indication that her hospitality is not wanted.—Mirror and Farmer.

DECORATION NOTES.

In decoration and furnishing, as well as in dress, green is a dominant note of color. Green has even invaded piano cases, pianos for country cottages having all the woodwork stained a soft "forest green," says the Ladies' World.

A charming piano in forest green had for its decoration designs of stately fleur-de-lis stained in the royal colors of that regal blossom, only in flatted tones of the lilac and purple. This departure is at once artistic and elegant.

Lamps of very decorative character come in metal finished in a gray green bronze effect, touched here and there with splashes of dull purple and old rose. These lamps accord with the general use of green in furnishing and are made for that purpose.

A novelty veiling, which is attractive because of the odd combination, has royal blue and grass green designs on a navy blue foundation.

Cotton Warehouse.

The cotton ware house will be a benefit to our people now, as W. I. Mullins has bought a controlling interest in the company and will give it the benefit of his experience and command of capital. Everything is to be put in first class order, such as scales, platforms, etc. Men can store their cotton and borrow money at reasonable interest on the warehouse receipts and can then hold their cotton for a just price. This will be a great help especially this season, as there is every evidence of a combination having been formed to keep the price of cotton down until it gets out of the growers' hands. When our farmers do with their cotton as the northern and western farmers do with their corn and wheat, that is, put their grain in their own elevators and wait for the best price, then they will get the full return for their labor.

The Probate Office.

Probate Judge S. M. Adams has resigned his office and E. B. Deason has been appointed in his stead. We hear that Adams' reason for giving up his office is that he wants to go west, and did not wish to be hampered in his movements by the requirements of the office for the short time that he still can serve. As Deason's promotion vacates the office of circuit clerk, it is said that the "powers that be" will appoint W. H. Foshee to that position. Neither of these new appointees will hardly get their places warm before they vacate in November to make way for L. H. Reynolds and S. W. Collins.

Registration.

The following clipping from the Birmingham News of the 19th inst shows that the registrars in Jefferson county take a different view of their duties under the law to what the registrars in Chilton do:

Many Negroes are Applying and Large Number Pass Necessary Qualifications.

Registration of voters in precincts 21 and 37 under the permanent plan of the constitution is proceeding at the rate of about one hundred a day. That is to say, the total for the five days in which the county board has been in session in this city will approximate 500.

The registration of negroes is very heavy. A member of the board estimates that it is 30 to 35 per cent of the total registration in the two beats. For instance, at 2 o'clock this afternoon 65 voters had registered, and of the number 18 were negroes.

The negroes are appearing in large numbers before the board. The word has evidently been passed among them that they will be registered if they possess the necessary qualifications, and they are taking advantage of the opportunity.

Many of the negroes qualify under the property clause, but not a few of them meet the educational test.

White citizens, on the other hand, are apparently apathetic in the matter of securing registration certificates.

The Supreme lodge of Knights of Pythias decided to hold their next biennial encampment in New Orleans. New Orleans won by a vote of 99 to 41. The encampment will be held the third Tuesday in September, 1906.

Fifteen states are represented at the national snoot on the new range at Fort Riley, Kan. Alabama and Georgia are there with teams of eighteen men.

Over fifty houses are in course of erection between Ensley and Owenton

The presence of an engineering party operating in the vicinity of Tuscumbia in the interest of the Illinois Central railroad has revived the rumor that that road is planning to enter this territory. The company made a preliminary survey from Jackson, Tenn., to Sheffield and through the mountains to Tuscumbia last spring, suspending work rather unexpectedly, and the renewal of operations gives color to the belief that the work is being continued.

During July 25,504 tons of steel rails were exported from the United States to various parts of the world, compared with 21,291 tons in June.

ABOUT REGISTERING.

Extracts from the general election law of Alabama:

Section 2. The following persons shall be disqualified both from registering and voting: All idiots and insane persons; those who were by reason of conviction of crime disqualified from voting at the time of the ratification of the constitution on November 28, 1901; those who have been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted of treason, murder, arson, embezzlement, malfeasance in office, larceny, receiving stolen property, obtaining money under false pretenses, perjury, subornation of perjury, robbery, assault with intent to rob, burglary, forgery, bribery, assault and battery on wife, bigamy, living in adultery, sodomy, incest, rape, miscegenation, crime against nature, or any crime punishable by imprisonment in penitentiary, or for any infamous crimes or crime involving moral turpitude; also, any person who has been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted as a vagrant or tramp, or of selling or offering to sell his vote or the vote of another, or of making or offering to make false returns in any election by the people or in any primary election to procure the nomination or election of any person to any office, or of suborning any witness or registrar to secure the registration of any person as an elector, provided that any person who is disqualified from voting by reason of conviction of any of the offenses mentioned in this section, except treason, whether the conviction was had in a state or federal court, has been pardoned, may be restored to his citizenship with right to vote by the governor, approved by the board of pardons and specially expressed in the pardon.

Sec. 7 1-2. The following persons and no others, who, if their place of residence shall remain unchanged, will have, at the date of the next general election, the qualifications as to resilence prescribed by section 1 of this act, shall be qualified to register as electors, provided they shall not be disqualified under section 2 of this act:

1st. Those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who are physically unable to work; and those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who have worked or been regularly engaged in some lawful employment, business or occupation, trade or calling for the greater part of the twelve months next preceding the time they offer to register, and those who are unable to read and write, if such inability is due solely to physical disability; or,

2d. The owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of forty acres of land situate in this state, upon which they reside; or the owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of any woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of real estate situate in this state, assessed for taxation at the value of three hundred dollars or more or the owner in good faith, in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith, in her own right, of personal property in this state assessed for taxation for three hundred dollars or more; provided, that the taxes due upon such real or personal property for the year next preceding the year in which he offers to register shall have been paid, unless the assessment shall have been legally contested and is undetermined.

Sec. 15. Any elector who registered prior to January 1, 1903, who has changed the county of his residence shall be registered on application on production of his certificate, unless he has since become disqualified.

Sec. 16. When the certificate of any elector who was duly registered has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, on application stating that the certificate has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, and verified by affidavit, and it appears of record that such applicant has been registered, the judge of probate of the county of registration or the secretary of state shall issue to the applicant a certificate that he was duly registered as an elector. Such certificate shall be issued free of charge to the elector. The secretary of state shall at the expense of the state furnish the judge of probate blank certificates for use as provided in this section.

The certificate of the registrars or the judge of probate or of the secretary of state shall be sufficient to establish the fact of such registration,

Be sure and register when the registrars are in your beat, as the only excuse for not doing so is by reason of sickness of yourself or in your family, or by absence from the county. Everybody can register this summer who will be qualified by residence or age by the 8th day of November. Poll tax paying has nothing to do with registration; you can register now and pay your poll tax afterwards, but you can not vote unless you are both registered and have paid your poll tax (if any is due). The period of residence necessary to register is two years in the state, one year in the county, and three months in the beat. If you have moved from one beat to another in the county less than three months before election day, you can vote in your old beat, so you don't lose your vote by changing beats. Any one who desires to register on property qualification should take with him his last assessment sheet and tax collector's receipt to show to the registrars as proof that you are possessed of such property, and pay taxes on it. You can register under ANY of the following heads:

1. If you own 40 acres or more land in this state, and reside upon it.

2. If your wife owns 40 acres or more land in this state, upon which you reside.

3. If you own real estate in this state that is assessed for taxation at $300 or more.

4. If your wife owns real estate in this state assessed for taxation at $300 or more.

5. If you own personal property in this state assessed for taxation for $300 or more.

6. If your wife owns personal property in this state assessed for taxation for $300 or more.

7. If you can read and write any section of the constitution of the United States.

Don't give up your life certificate that you got in 1902; you only have to show it to the registrars in case you have moved to this county from some other county.

THE UNION will furnish any one information on any special points that they may be in doubt upon, and stands ready to help any one to get all the rights he is entitled to under the laws of Alabama. If you think you are entitled to register and the registrars should refuse you, take a couple of good men with you so you can have witnesses as to such refusal and the reasons given by the registrars, and thereby be enabled to take your case up to higher authority. tf

Dr. Swallow, prohibition candidate for the presidency, summarizes the monetary cost of the liquor industry to the nation—$16.50 to every $1 paid into the treasuries, municipal, state and national—as uncontrovertible proof that the liquor business of the 250,000 liquor dealers in America who last year "filched from the hard earnings of breadwinners $1,400,000," is a constant and serious infringement upon the rights of all our eighty million people.

IN A GOLDEN CARRIAGE

Czarovitch Alexis Will Ride to His Christening.

St. Petersburg's golden carriages, which are used only at the time of imperial christenings, have been taken from the annex to the palace where state coaches and sleighs are kept, and drawn by six pairs of milk white steeds gorgeously caparisoned, removed to Peterhoff to be used in conveying the heir of all Russians from the villa Alexandria to the great palace a couple of miles distant.

Two of the highest personages in the land—the young empress and Emperor Nicholas—will be absent. Their majesties cannot enter the church while the christening is in progress because it is contrary to the rule of the orthodox church for parents to attend such ceremonies, the god parents being considered as representing them before the Almighty.

Little Alexis will be borne to the font accompanied by Prince Henry of Prussia and Prince Louis of Battenberg, representing the god fathers, Emperor William and King Edward, and by the godmother, the empress dowager. The metropolitian of St. Petersburg will have the honor of annointing the infant and immersing him in holy water (complete immersion is necessary, according to the rules of the church).

It was at first intended to follow the custom of giving a grand banquet at the palace after the christening, but the sovereigns have decided to forego functions of this kind while the country is undergoing the ordeal of war.

RYANS CLAIMS SEABOARD.

Recent Purchase of Stock Gives Him Its Control.

Thomas F. Ryan states that he has purchased for himself and associates, Blair and Co. and T. Jefferson Coolidge, Jr., the Seaboard Air Line stock which was held by Messrs. Williams and Middendorff, amounting to 140,000 shares, and that these gentlemen will resign from the board of directors the transaction, it is understood that Messrs. Ryan, Blair and Coolidge now own about $25,000,000 of Seaboard stock and that their friends, including C. Sidney Shepard, own $15,000,000 more, making about $40,000,000 out of a total capital stock of $62,000,000.

The gross earnings of the Seaboard Air Line system for the twelve months ended June 30, 1904, exceeded $13,000,000 The surplus earnings after the payment of operating expenses, taxes and fixed charges, including interest on bonds, interest on car trusts and rentals amounted to $5,000,000.

Seaboard Air Line railway has loaned larger sums of money to the Atlanta and Birmingham road for construction purposes in advance of the issuance of the first mortgage bonds on that property, and as the track is laid and completed these bonds are being delivered to the Atlanta and Birmingham bond syndicate and paid for.

BANK ROBBED.

While the Cashier Was Gone to Dinner—No Clew.

A bold daylight robbery took place at Stevenson Saturday during the noon hour. Charles Alston, the cashier of the bank, went to dinner at the usual hour, 12 o'clock, and on his return found that robbers had entered the bank from the rear of the building through a window and had taken from the cash drawer all the money in it, between $900 and $1000, leaving as silently as they entered without being detected by any one.

Bloodhounds were telegraphed for, and in three hours after the discovery was made Detective Chipps was on the spot from Chattanooga with his dogs. The dogs took the trail readily and run it a mile due west to the coal chute on the Southern railroad and could do nothing more with it.

The supposition is the robber boarded a train at that point thus making good his escape for the time.

Shot Three Times.

Richard Pettus, a young man said to have been in several altercations in the past, put his pistol in the face of E. E. Dickerson, a peaceful Montgomery mechanic, and was shot three times. His wounds are expected to prove fatal.

Dickerson went to a grocery store, and Pettus was there, and, it is said, was under the influence of whisky. He walked up to Dickerson, whom he knew only slightly, and wig-wagged his revolver in his face. Dickerson tried to get away and finally dropped his hands to his side. Pettus took this for an attempt to draw a gun and fired, the ball grazing Dickerson's neck.

The latter then drew his pistol and fired three times, hitting Pettus twice in the breast and once in the neck, all the wounds being regarded as fatal.

A Companion

He often brings us pleasure,
He sometimes brings us pain;
He fills our hearts with trouble,
Then cheers us up again.

He gives us introductions,
But fails to make amends
For the severance of loved ones,
For the loss of faithful friends.

The blooming cheek of beauty
He smites with slow decay;
The raven locks of manhood
He surely streaks with gray.

At each step on life's ladder
That we essay to climb,
He's always close behind us,
Old, ruthless Father Time.

"I think I'll get married," said Penelope to herself, as she sat in a quiet corner on the veranda of the Seaside hotel.

Penelope was young and pretty. No level-headed person would ever have thought of making an assertion that, by any possibility, could be construed as contradictory to such plausable facts. And every man at the hotel was heels over head in love with her.

After having reached this important matrimonial decision, she charged along the piazza, so wrapt in her cogitations that at a sharp turn she bumped, with considerable violence, into Tom Hathaway.

"Oh!" she gasped, "I beg your pardon! I—"

"You can't have it," interrupted Tom. "There's no reason why I should give it to you. It was delightful."

"Tom Hathaway, aren't you ashamed—"

"Not at all," said Tom. "Let's play golf."

"But it's so hot," protested Penelope. "Even the caddies are asleep."

"Never mind," said Tom. "Then we'll have the links all to ourselves. Come along."

Tom was on his knees, making her tee, when it happened. Penelope stood close by him. Suddenly he seized her hand.

"Penelope, dearest, for a long time I have wanted to tell you something. I want to say" (he fervently kissed her hand) "that I—"

"Oh, Tom!" screamed Penelope. "Whatever is the matter?"

Tom had jumped to his feet and was wildly grabbing at his mouth and choking. He had planted a passionate kiss on a wad of damp sand that, in his excitement, he had pressed into her hand.

"Hello, what's up?" and Bob Hamilton, who had heard Penelope scream, came running out of the club house.

"I—I guess Tom has some sand in his mouth," said Penelope.

"Good," said Bob; "it's good for his digestion. But how on earth—"

He stopped short. Neither of his listeners was in a condition to utter an intelligible answer. Tom made a break for the pump, and Penelope was sitting on the ground, sobbing with laughter.

"What in heaven's name is the matter with Tom?" asked Bob, after she had in a measure recovered her composure.

"He just had an accident," she replied.

"Oh, all right," said Bob. "If you don't want to tell, I don't want to know. Let's take a walk."

They promenaded lazily until they came upon a secluded bench. They sat and chatted, and his arm crept toward her waist, much to the consternation of an old gardener, who unobserved behind them was sprinkling the lawn with a hose.

"There is something I have long wanted to say to you," began Bob.

"Oh, dear!" sighed Penelope to herself. "They all begin the same way."

"I want to tell you a secret, darling," he said, approaching near to her lips than her ear.

Seized her hand.

The poor gardener was so perturbed at Bob's words and actions that he nervously dropped the hose.

Bob opened his mouth to make the rest of his declaration, and was astounded to receive in it an inch stream of water. Gasping and spluttering, he struggled to his feet. In mad consternation, the gardener clutched the offending hose and disappeared.

Penelope gazed at Bob with stunned horror and surprise.

"You—you are not having a fit, are you, Bob?" she asked tremulously

"Some careless damn fool—" sputtered Bob.

"Beg pardon!" exclaimed Fred Chase, another of the Devoted Circle, suddenly coming into view, with a pair of oars over his shoulder. "Penelope, I'm ashamed of you. I didn't think you would tolerate profanity—even from Bob," he tacked on with good-natured sarcasm.

Bob glared at him, and, without a word to either of them, stalked away.

"What's the rip with Bob?" asked Fred. "He looks out of sorts."

"He feels a little tired," she said drily. "Is it nice rowing?" she added quickly, anxious to divert his attention from poor Bob.

"It is if you have a parasol and are prepared to lie quite still," he said. "Come and try it, anyway."

As she sank down on the boat cushions, she gave a little sigh. "I suppose he couldn't have gone on after that," she murmured half loud.

"Eh, what's that?" asked Fred.

"I was thinking how handsome you look in that hat," she replied calmly.

"Thanks," said Fred. "The same to you and many of them."

"You don't talk connectedly, Fred," commented Penelope.

"How could I," suddenly burst out Fred, "with you so near me? Penelops, dear, I want a wife."

"He's original, at any rate," thought Penelope.

"And you, darling, ever since that day—"

"Look where you're going, Fred!" shrieked Penelope.

It was too late. The boat crashed into a rock that stood half out of the water. The boat stopped. Fred didn't. He kept on going and landed on his back several feet the other side of the rock.

"Fred, oh, Fred, are you drowned?" cried Penelope.

"You were going to say?" she said, softly.

But it happened that Fred was not drowned. He presently reappeared, standing in about four feet of water. Nevertheless, Malarack Hartford, who, from the shore, had witnessed the latter part of the incident, jumped into somebody's boat and pulled frantically for the scene of the disturbance. He first made sure than Penelope was not hurt, and then rowed over to Fred, who was busily engaged in wiping the water from his face and cursing himself heartily.

"Too bad, old man," said Malarack. "Jump into the boat and I'll take you to Penelope."

"No," said Fred, "I'm too—wet. You take her ashore, old chap, and I'll be everlastingly obliged to you. I'll take your boat."

Malarack was not at all reluctant to make the change, and soon had Penelope on terra firma.

"Do let us walk under the trees," said Penelope. "So much has happened to me to-day that my nerves are quite on edge."

Malarack assented. As they strolled along, Malarack suddenly turned and said:

"Penelope, there is something I have wanted to say to you for a long while. I—"

"Wait!" cried Penelope, with sudden decision. "Sit down on that bench."

Malarack stared at her curiously and complied.

"You won't fall off, will you?" asked Penelope.

"I should hope not," said Malarack, looking at her in blank surprise.

"Please put that parasol over your shoulder," directed Penelope.

Malarack did so, eyeing her nervously.

"Have you any sand in your pockets?" she suddenly demanded.

"Penelope!" he began severely.

"There! It's all right now," said Penelope, sinking down beside him. Malarack, after all, was the one she would have chosen, she thought. "You were going to say?" she said softly.

"Eh? Oh, yes," replied Malarack. "I have been waiting to tell you, as an old friend, that you really powder your nose too heavily. Now, I hope—good Heavens! Penelope, what ails you?"

Penelope had fainted.

GRIEVED HIM TO PAY TWICE.

How Two Dollars Spoiled an Afternoon for Russell Sage.

Russell Sage seldom takes any amusement. His pleasure is working and gathering in the gold eagles. Yet Uncle Russell not only had to pay for tickets for an entertainment, but he had to pay the second time.

A few years ago Miss Helen Gould gave a lawn fete at Lynhurst on Hudson for the benefit of the navy branch of the Young Men's Christian association. The tickets of admission were $1 each. Mr. and Mrs. Sage are close friends of Miss Gould, and she often entertains them. Mr. Sage bought two tickets.

On the afternoon of the lawn fete he and Mrs. Sage left New York for Irvington, and thence went to Miss Gould's by stage. Miss Gould's orders were that no one should be admitted to the grounds without a ticket. The police were on hand to enforce this command.

The stage that Mr. and Mrs. Sage came in was full of people. Tickets were demanded, and every one showed his excepting Mr. Sage. He fumbled around in all his pockets, and kept the stage and its occupants waiting for about five minutes.

Finally he said: "I'm Russell Sage. I bought two tickets, but I have forgotten to bring them."

The ticket man replied: "Miss Gould's order is that every one must have a ticket. You are blocking the way; so please give me $2 or stay out."

Mr. Sage reached down deep and brought out two old dollar bills and handed them to the ticket man, heaving a heavy sigh. The saddest part of the story was that Mr. Sage found the two missing tickets after he was in the grounds.

At Rest.

Servant of God, well done!
Rest from thy loved employ!
The battle fought, the victory won,
Enter thy Master's joy.
The voice at midnight came,
He started up to hear,
A mortal arrow pierced his frame;
He fell, but felt no fear.

Tranquil amidst alarms,
It found him on the field,
A veteran slumb'ring on his arms
Beneath his red-cross shield.
His sword was in his hand,
Still warm with recent fight;
Ready that moment, at command,
Through rock and steel to smite.

At midnight came the cry,
"To meet thy God prepare!"
He woke, and caught his Captain's eye,
Then, strong in faith and prayer,
His spirit with a bound
Burst its encumbering clay;
His tent, at sunrise, on the ground,
A darkened ruin lay.

The pains of death are past;
Labor and sorrow cease,
And life's long warfare closed at last,
His soul is found in peace.
Soldier of Christ, well done!
Praise be thy new employ;
And while eternal ages run,
Rest in thy Saviour's joy.

No Children in Japan.

There are no children in Japan. They are dignified burlesques on the grown-ups. The little girls of the family take care of the babies by having them strapped to their backs. Nearly every maid of 5 or 6 has a baby tied to her back and perhaps that accounts for the bent back and tottering gait of the Japanese woman. Though one never hears a Jap baby cry, if one begins to make a mouth and wrinkles up its funny little face, its child-mother quiets it by raising her body on her toes and heels as fast as she can, and placidity reigns in short order. A man would feel like a fool quoting "Mother Goose" to a Japanese child or trying to amuse it as one does our children. As for chucking one under the chin, that's unthinkable.

Countess to the Rescue.

The Countess Cassini at the bazaar that she recently held in Washington for the benefit of the Russian Red Cross was conversing with the rather elderly wife of a Senator when a third lady drew near.

"How do you do, Countess? Mrs. Blank, how do you do?" said the third lady. And then she added, in a spiteful tone: "You look older to-day than usual, Mrs. Blank."

Poor Mrs. Blank blushed, but the Russian Countess came to her rescue gallantly.

"Well," she said, laughing, "why shouldn't she? She is older to-day than she ever was before in her life."—Denver Times.

Pleased With the Prospect.

Sheriff Dienst of Labette county recently took Rastus Rose, a photographer, to the insane asylum at Osawatomie. Mr. Rose was pleased with much that he saw along the road. He continually regretted the absence of his camera, which prevented him from preserving the beautiful landscapes through which the train was passing. Arriving at Osawatomie, he was enraptured with the gardens and shrubbery surrounding the asylum. "You like it, do you?" asked the sheriff. "Like it! Like it!" exclaimed the prisoner. "Why, if I'd known it was like this, I'd have gone crazy a year ago."—Kansas City Journal.

TOO KEEN A BARGAINER.

Woman Shopper Overreached Herself in Her Eagerness.

The late Levi Z. Leiter now and then used to narrate incidents of his early life as a clerk in a dry goods shop of Leitersburg, Md. With one of these incidents, as with a parable, Mr. Leiter would often illustrate some point he wished to make.

"Be frugal and careful in your dealings," he said to a young business man one day, "but never be grasping. Never try to overreach. Such courses too often make a man ridiculous, and give him besides a bad reputation that lasts all his life.

"A reputation of this kind was acquired in a moment in our Leitersburg store by a woman, and she could never shake it off.

"This woman came into the store and said to me, in the presence of a good-sized crowd of people:

"'How much is this guimpe, young man?'

"'One dollar a yard, ma'am,' said I.

"But she was slightly deaf. She misunderstood me.

"'Two dollars a yard?' she exclaimed. 'Well, it ain't worth it. I'll give ye a dollar and a half, and that's all I'll give.'

"'One dollar, ma'am, is the price,' I repeated in a louder key.

"'Oh,' she said. 'That's much too high. I'll give ye 75 cents.'"

The Rue-Anemone.

Under an oak tree in a woodland, where
The dreaming spring had dropped it from her hair,
I found a flower, through which I seemed to gaze
Beyond the world and see what no man dare
Behold and live—the myths of bygone days:
Diana and Endymion and the bare
Slim beauty of the boy whom Echo wooed,
And Hyacinthus, whom Apollo dewed
With love and death, and Daphne, ever fair,
And that reed-slender girl whom Pan pursued.

I stood and gazed, and through it seemed to see
The Dryad's feet dance by the forest tree,
Her hair wild blown; the Faun, with listening ear,
Deep in the boscage, kneeling on one knee,
Watching the wandered Oread draw near,
Her wild heart beating like a honey bee
Within a rose—all, the myths of old,
All, all the bright shapes of the age of gold,
Peopling the wonder worlds of poetry,
Through it I seemed in fancy to behold.

What other flower that, fashioned like a star,
Draws its frail life from earth and braves the war
Of all the heavens, can suggest the dreams
That this suggests, in whom no trace of mar
Or soil exists; where stainless innocence seems
Enshrined, and where, beyond our vision far,
That inaccessible beauty which the heart
Worships as truth and holiness and art
Is symbolized; wherein embodied are
The things that make the soul's immortal part?

Biblical Injunction Reversed.

Most farmers, and especially boys, take trouble to hunt down a snake when they are really the farmers' friends. Many person will leave a carriage or team in the road to kill a snake they see upon the roadside. And as for the blacksnake that lives under the house or old porch, it is a greater enemy to mice and rats than the best cat could possibly be, while it would not harm an infant; in fact, could be tamed to be very interesting. Kindness always wins snakes, and they will show it as perceptibly as most creatures. A blacksnake pet is more cleanly than a dog or cat, is far less trouble, will respond to the familiar call just as quickly, show every evidence of affection as sincerely, and if its fangs should scratch the skin or even penetrate the flesh the result is not so annoying as the scratches from the briars that come from picking roses or blackberries.—Easton (Md.) Gazette.

She Called It Living.

It is strange to mark the contrast of existence between two people living practically side by side with each other. Into the fortunes of one so much is crowded—changes, events and various happenings—so that a decade of the life of this one is more than the allotted threescore and ten of the other. "Nothing has ever happened to me," said a girl of twenty-three, rather discontentedly, "and just see what Mildred S—— has had! We left school together at eighteen. Since then she has been engaged, broke it off, become engaged again, married, quarrelled with her husband, got a divorce, and is now back home again with all that behind her, while I have been going on exactly the same."

"But you certainly do not think her lot an enviable one?" queried her mother, laughing.

"No," said the girl, doubtfully; "but it was living. I don't know but that is better than merely existing."

Forced Contribution.

Not long ago in New York some philanthropic effort was started in a church to raise funds, and it was decided to have a special sermon and collection. Mr. H—— was appointed one of the members to pass the plate. Meeting a friend on Broadway, and being very anxious for a large collection, he urged his attendance. The friend was compelled to leave the city that very day, but stated that he had given his wife a five-dollar bill for the collection.

As the plate was passed, the lady put in $3. Mr. H——, instead of passing on, stopped and, in an undertone, said:

"No you don't. I want the other $2. You know your husband gave you $5."

The lady, very much astonished, said:

"Do move on, Mr. H——"

"No," replied H——, "I'll remain here till I get the other $2."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

In the Sunny South

Here is an example of typical southern politeness:

Two miles out of Memphis a big steam automobile was running along a beautiful country road. It was driven by its owner, who, in order to make it impossible to identify him, may be called Col. Jones.

Half a mile away appeared a light buggy, drawn by a nervous horse and driven by a young southerner who was taking his sweetheart out for a ride in the soft spring air. When the horse spied the approaching automobile it cut a few didos. Col. Jones instantly brought his machine to a full stop as near the side of the road as possible, there being a deep ditch on either side the central driveway.

All went well until the horse reached the auto, when, apparently out of pure nervousness, it pranced a little. Then the youthful driver, anxious to prove to the young woman at his side that he was master of the situation, drew his whip and struck the already frightened horse a heavy blow. Instantly the animal plunged sideways. The wheels left the roadbed, the driver flew out of the buggy and struck the [illegible] off. On top of [illegible] of her escort the [illegible] ed.

Man Toyed with Fate

In the armies of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the custom of casting lots to decide what soldiers should be punished for the offenses of all was common. At Winchester, England, in 1645, complaint was made that after the surrender there had been unfair plundering. Six soldiers were tried and found guilty and it was decided by lot which one of the six should be hanged. At Tangiers in 1663, and again in 1665, two soldiers had to cast dice on a drumhead and he who threw the least was executed. Thomas May's translation of Barclay's "Icon Animorum" gives a curious story of this sort. Speaking of English courage, he says that during the war in the Netherlands some soldiers of the Spanish party were taken prisoners by the Dutch, who decided to make reprisals for the previous cruelty of their enemies. Out of four-and-twenty men eight were to be hanged. "There were lots, therefore, thrown into a helmet," says May, "and the prisoners were commanded to draw their fortunes—whoever should draw a blank was to escape, but whoever should draw a black lot was to be hanged presently.

"They were all," says May, "possessed with a great apprehension of their present danger, especially the Spaniard. Their pitiful wishes, tears in some of the standers-by move pity, in others laughter! [illegible] was besides in that danger an [illegible] lishman, a common soldier, who [illegible] a careless countenance, expressing fear at death at all, came boldly the helmet and drew his lot. May further relates that [illegible] consented to the madman's request who valued his life at so low a rate and he again drew a safe lot; but seems rather to regret the [illegible] escape of the foolhardy Englishman whom he denounces as "a wretch unworthy not only of that [illegible] even of a single preservation, who basely had undervalued his life."

Old Man's One Regret

Dean Hart of Denver contributes to the Outlook's Annual Recreation Number an entertaining article called "A Day's Fishing in Colorado," in the course of which he tells this story:

They had a fishing club in one of the middle states; the keeper and factotum of the club was "Old Sammy." Despite his healthful occupation age grew on him, and unable longer to "watch" the river, there was only one place for the lone old man—the county house. Here, as the end was surely coming, the pastor of the church was asked to see him. To meet the Great Proprietor with a vast accumulation of debt is an ordeal that every wise man may well dread, and seek to prepare for. The man with the gospel, trying to induce Sam to see the prime necessity of [illegible] the cliff to touch the place of [illegible] was leading him to admit his [illegible] rupt condition, that he might [illegible] mercy of him whose "property it [illegible] have' mercy and to forgive." "Well, now," pursued [illegible] visitor, "if you had your life to [illegible] over again, wouldn't you do [illegible] in some respects?". "Maybe I [illegible] was the cautious rejoinder. "[illegible] now, suppose you had the chance [illegible] living all these years over again, [illegible] what particular would you do [illegible] ently?" After a minute's silence [illegible] old man, true to the ruling [illegible] strong even in death, replied: "[illegible] if I had my life to live over [illegible] I'd fish more with bait than with [illegible]

It's Policy, You Know

When a man comes home quite late
In a rather boozy state
How his wife will welt it to him with her tongue!
And he'll sit there calm and mute
While she tells him he's a brute,
Just the greatest beast that ever went unhung!
Let him hint he has his eyes
On a hat about her size,
Down her cheeks the damp, repentant tears will flow.
And she'll clasp him in her arms
And dilate upon his charms—
It is policy to do it, don't you know.

In her home a pretty girl,
One you'd think a priceless pearl,
Will be spiteful, cross and surly as a bear,
She will snap at her mamma,
Scold her venerable pa
And will pull her little brother's tousled hair;
But when Freddie comes to woo
She will smile and bill and coo,
Not a trace of ugly temper will she show;
She'll be gentle as a dove,
Little lambkin thrilled with love—
It is policy to do it, don't you know.
Many men engaged in trade
Lay their scruples in the shade
And will skin their fellow men in a deal.
They will play their cards to win
Even to the verge of sin,
And the slightest prick of conscience never feel.
Then upon the Sabbath day
To the church will wend their way
And the praises from their pews will flow.
They will sing and lead in prayer
With a humble Christian air—
It is policy to do it, don't you know.

Thus it is the country o'er
If you probe them to the core
Many men you'll find who lead a double life.
Yet they half way think it's right
That to win the earthly fight
They must use deceptive weapons in the strife.
When their final race is run,
When their mortal work is done
And they hear the summons calling them to go,
It should be their last request
In asbestos to be dressed
'Twould be policy to do it, don't you know.

War Spirit of Japan

The Daily Express prints an interesting letter from its Tokio correspondent on the spirit and temper of the Japanese people in the present war. One striking instance is that of a widow who committed suicide when she discovered that her only son refrained from volunteering because he was her sole support. Another story, told the correspondent at the war office in Tokio was of seven old men who sent a letter written in their blood begging that, as military regulations debarred them from serving in the regular army, they might be allowed to form a "battotai," or battalion of swordsmen, who in former times rushed at the enemy with blades unsheathed. Numbers of letters have also been received from schoolboys under the age limit offering to go to the front as servants in any capacity. Discipline, intelligence and equipment are powerful assets in a national struggle, but what renders the Japanese so peculiarly formidable is that their efficiency is backed by a fervid patriotism animating all ranks and ages. The nation forms one vast forlorn hope.—Spectator.

an unmarked grave in the Mt. Joy Cemetery of Dublin, he says: "No, Mr. Parnell, a mighty will does not make every great man safe." What shall fathers tell their boys? That a weak will is the better for them? Nay, verily. Great force is to the boy what momentum is to the rifle ball. A boy without will cannot live. He needs every ounce he can acquire, but this alone will not make him morally safe or spiritually strong. The hope of a man is not in his family, not in his force, nor yet is it in his furnishings, which I use as the equivalent for the will of man. John says neither the individual nor the world will be saved by its furnishings. When Jonah went to Nineveh, one of the reasons for his going was that 120,000 people needed education—"they could not tell their right hand from their left." That same cry goes up to-day. Only educate and train; that is sufficient. Your section is not so whitewashed with this system of ethical culture as some others I know. But we never can emphasize too often or too positively the final tenet of Christ's creed that what a man needs primarily is not accession of brain, but a fresh heart; not illumination, but reconstruction, the establishment in him by grace of something that is not in him by nature. Illumination of the brain is never clarification of the heart. There was a man in our American life who was born of the best family, with a personal force that commanded men and captivated women, whose furnishings could scarcely be surpassed, and yet there has not walked across the pages of American history a blacker hearted villian than Aaron Burr. I am as far as possible from saying that knowledge makes a man worse; my only contention is that it has not in itself the power of making men better. Ideas, education alone, can neither reconstruct the life nor recreate the heart.

This is a thoughtful age; men are brainy; all about us there is a passion for new ideas; but our most urgent necessity is not of idea but of power. What we need most of all is not schooling but baptism, and that is to come through faith.

What is this faith that is to give us the supreme victory and insure our safety? It is at this distinct point that we begin to learn the real meaning and purpose of faith. Every little while I am told by one and another that he would like to have faith in this particular matter in regard to the Bible, or in regard to Christ in the future life as though if his mind could only be brought intellectually to consent to it, the consummation would be reached and a great result achieved. Being prepared to assent to this or that particular statement in regard to Christ, for example, is a very distinct thing from faith. Faith is personal attitude, personal relationship. Faith is such a personal yielding of ourselves to another as brings us into living contact with that other and so makes us recipient of what it lies in that other to confer. The child becomes like his father by faith in his father, because his faith is that inward surrender that makes him susceptible to every impression that goes forth from his father. A child's faith toward his mother is not faith that what his mother says is true; it is faith in his mother, the hiding of himself in the one life that enwraps them both, so that he lives in the sweep of her inspiration and grows up toward manhood by the appropriation of personal vigor, wisdom and sweetness hourly made over him. And that is cast in the same mold as Gospel faith, which is as a cord by which the living Christ holds the believer to Himself. Faith is not a condition wherein we hold to something or somebody, as that in which we are held by something or somebody. It is not holding a doctrine, but being held by a person. "I know whom I have believed." The iron filings stick to the magnet, not because they try so hard to stick, but because they are mastered by the magnet.

Faith, then, has for its very essence a personal self-commitment, one ounce of which is worth a whole ton of intellectual affirmation. It is this sense of being held by God that makes a man safe and secure. I do not know how the grace of God can take a man like Saul of Tarsus and make him Paul the Apostle; but no man will question his knowledge when he says: "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." That is exactly what John B. Gough cried as he went like a flaming torch blazing the way for a multitude of hopeless drunkards. The hope, and the only hope, for us all is in the grace of God. If I were to strike a tuning fork on this desk and hold it to my ear not one in this room could hear the sound thereof, but I could hear it and tune my violin. Strike it again and instead of holding it to my ear, set it upon this desk. Instantly the sound would be heard everywhere. But what do you hear? Not the tuning fork, for the tuning fork makes no louder sound the second time than it did the first. What do you hear? You hear this hard wood desk, which has no music in itself, but just as soon as it comes in contact with a musical instrument it itself becomes musical and delights every one that has music in his soul.

The individual life may be insignificant alone by itself; it may come from a good family or a bad; it may have great force or little; it may have choice furnishings or not; but the safety and security of all will depend upon the personal self surrender to the Son of God, who alone has the power to make them Sons of God, which are born not of a family or of force or of furnishings, but of faith.

Power of an Ideal.

A beautiful statue once stood in the market place of an Italian city. It was the statue of a Greek slave girl. It represented the slave as tidy, well dressed and handsome. A ragged, unkempt, forlorn street child, coming across the statue in her play, stopped and gazed at it in admiration. She was entranced and captivated by it. She gazed long and admiringly. Moved by a sudden impulse, she went home and washed her face and combed her hair. Another day she stopped again before the same statue and admired it, and received new inspiration. Next day her tattered clothes were washed and mended. Each time she looked at the statue she found something in its beauties until she was a transformed child.—Treasury of Religious Thought.

Wanted: "A Positive Gospel.

It is the preacher of positive faith and conviction who most deeply impresses a congregation and who has the greatest staying power among a people. Nebulosity of belief and statement does not commend him to the public. A firm grip of truth makes him strong and vigorous in preaching and influential in and persuasive in spirit and activity. The more clear cut he is in his views of Bible doctrine and practice, the more ready are choice and intelligent souls to accept him as their religious guide, and the greater their combined influence in the community in which it is centered. A larger enthusiasm is quickened among its adherents, and a growing increase in the number of recruits is sure to follow his faithful and zealous ministry.—The Presbyterian.

The First Result of Effort.

Every real and searching effort of self-improvement is of itself a lesson of profound humility. For we cannot move a step without learning and feeling the waywardness, the weakness, the vacillation of our movements or without desiring to be set upon the Rock that is higher than ourselves.—William Ewart Gladstone.

TORTURING PAIN.

Half This Man's Sufferings Would Have Killed Many a Person, But Doan's Cured Him.

A. C. Sprague, stock dealer, of Normal, Ill., writes: "For two whole years I was doing nothing but buying medicines to cure my kidneys. I do not think that any man ever suffered as I did and lived. The pain in my back was so bad that I could not sleep at night. I could not ride a horse, and sometimes was unable even to ride in a car. My condition was critical when I sent for Doan's Kidney Pills. I used three boxes and they cured me. Now I can go anywhere and do as much as anybody. I sleep well and feel no discomfort at all."

IN THE BARREN LANDS.

Caspar Whitney's Experiences in an Unhospitable Region.

The Barren Lands, called by the Indians "Land of Little Sticks," are absolutely devoid, not only of trees, but even of brush, except for some stunted bushes to be found in occasional spots near the water's edge. These lands lie in British Columbia, near the Great Slave Lake. Mr. Casper Whitney, in describing a hunting trip through this region, in "Musk-Ox, Bison, Sheep and Goat," says that a venture into this north country, except in summer, means a struggle with both cold and famine. Yet the lack of food was not so hard to bear as the wind, and camping was a continual discomfort.

"One of the first lessons I learned," writes Mr. Whitney, "was to keep my face free from covering, and also as clean shaven as possible under such circumstances. It makes me smile now to remember the elaborate hood arrangement which was knitted for me in Canada, and which then seemed to me one of the most important articles of my equipment. It covered the entire head, ears and neck, with openings only for the eyes and mouth, and in town I had viewed it as a great find, but I threw it away before I got within a thousand miles of the Barren Grounds.

"The reason is obvious. My breath turned the front of the hood into a sheet of ice before I had run three miles; and as there was no fire in the Barren Grounds to thaw it, of course it was an impossible thing to wear in that region. After other experiments, I found the simplest and most comfortable headgear to be my own long hair, which hung even with my jaw, bound about just above the ears with a handkerchief, and the open hood of my caribou skin capote drawn forward over all.

"The most trying hour in the twenty-four was at the camping time in the afternoon. The fire furnished no warmth; it was not built for that purpose; it was simply to boil the tea, and perhaps an idea of its size can be given by saying that by the time the snow in the kettle had melted into water and the water begun to boil the fire was exhausted.

"Having drunk the tea, we rolled up in our robes, lying side by side round the tepee, with feet toward the fire and head against the sledge, knees into the back of the man next to you, and with your snowshoes under your head, away from the dogs that would eat the lacing.

"Sleep never came until the dogs had finished fighting over us, for as soon as we were rolled into our robes the dogs poured into the tepee. There were twenty-eight dogs, and the lodge was about seven feet in diameter at its base. No hour in the day or night was more miserable than this, when these half-starved brutes fought over and on top of us before they finally settled down upon us.

"In extremely cold weather a dog curled up at your feet or back is not unpleasant; but to have one lying on your head, another on your shoulders or hips, or perhaps a third on your feet, and you lying on your side on rocky, uneven ground, is not a happy experience."

The cost of the coronation of King Edward VII, establishes a record for modern times. It was considered until recently a lordly and magnificent thing for the subjects of George IV. to spend $605,000. William IV. and Queen Adelaide were content with a modest $250,000. It is not easy to understand in what King Edward's $1,795,000 was sunk.

Last year Oscar Zeller, of Zossen, started on foot from Berlin for a trip around the world. His plan was to go via Mukden, Vladivostock and Japan to America. The war frustrated that plan, and he has now started for Bering straits, along the northernmost Siberian telegraph line. His success is considered very doubtful.

When a native lady enters a Japanese railway carriage she slips her feet from her tiny shoes, stands upon the seat and then demurely sits with her feet doubled beneath her. A moment later she lights a cigarette or her little pipe, which holds just tobacco enough to produce two good whiffs of smoke. When the ticket collector, attired in a blue uniform, enters the carriage he removes his cap and twice bows politely. He repeats the bow as he comes to each passenger to collect the tickets.

The warm wave over the west has spread all over the country between the Mississippi river and the Rocky mountains and also over the southern states. It was particularly severe in South Dakota, where maximum temperatures reached 100 degrees. In the cotton belt the average maximum was 90 degrees and above, except in the Atlanta district, where it was not so warm. The maximum at Birmingham was 90 degrees.

When a Japanese girl marries she is taught that she is to reverence and obey her husband's relatives, his mother and father, as she has reverenced and obeyed her own parents. She must be able to cook rice properly, and her being unable to do so is considered not in the light of mere ignorance, but almost as a mortal sin; a young wife ignorant of the proper fulfilling of this domestic duty would very likely be returned to her parents' home.

One of the largest and most noticeable business signs seen anywhere is that of the National Casket Co. on their mammoth new factory at Nashville, Tenn., made on a wire frame with aluminum letters six feet high and one hundred feet long, which can be read from a long distance by day, and when reproduced in electric lights, can be read even further at night. This is the concern that is called on to furnish Caskets for the most prominent people everywhere, including among its recent orders, Caskets for Presidents William McKinley, Benjamin Harrison and the late lamented Gen. John B. Gordon, and yet whose goods can be had through the smallest undertaker in every town. From the fact that they are called on to furnish Caskets for the best citizens everywhere, there must be some merit in their claim that their goods are the best, and the South should be proud to have a branch of such a high class establishment within her borders.

Miss Hapgood tells how she was cured of Fallopian and Ovarian Inflammation—and escaped an awful operation by using Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I suffered for four years with what the doctors called Salpingitis (inflammation of the fallopian tubes) and ovaritis, which are most distressing and painful ailments, affecting all the surrounding parts, undermining the constitution, and sapping the life forces. If you had seen me a year ago, before I began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and had noticed the sunken eyes, sallow complexion, and general emaciated condition, and compared that person with me as I am today, robust, hearty and well, you would not wonder that I feel thankful to you and your wonderful medicine, which restored me to new life and health in five months, and saved me from an awful operation."—MISS IRENE HAPGOOD, 1022 Sandwich St., Windsor, Ont.

Ovaritis or inflammation of the ovaries or fallopian tubes which adjoin the ovaries may result from sudden stopping of the monthly flow, from inflammation of the womb, and many other causes. The slightest indication of trouble with the ovaries, indicated by dull throbbing pain in the side, accompanied by heat and shooting pains, should claim your instant attention. It will not cure itself, and a hospital operation, with all its terrors, may easily result from neglect.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I can truly say that you have saved my life, and I cannot express my gratitude to you in words.

"Before I wrote to you telling how I felt, I had doctored for over two years steady and spent lots of money in medicine besides, but it all failed to do me any good. My menses did not appear in that time, and I suffered much pain. I would daily have fainting spells, headache, backache and bearing down pain, and was so weak that it was hard for me to do my work.

"I used your medicine and treatment as directed, and after taking three bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, menses appeared, my womb troubles left me, and I have been regular ever since. I used fourteen bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and Blood Purifier together, and am now restored to perfect health. Had it not been for you, I would have been in my grave.

"I will always recommend your wonderful remedies, and hope that these few lines may lead others who suffer as I did to try your remedies."—MRS. T. C. WILLADSEN, R. R. No. 1, Manning, Iowa.

Such unquestionable testimony proves the power of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound over diseases of women.

Women should remember that they are privileged to consult Mrs. Pinkham at Lynn, Mass., about their illness, entirely free.

A Companion

He often brings us pleasure,
He sometimes brings us pain;
He fills our hearts with trouble,
Then cheers us up again.

He gives us introductions,
But fails to make amends
For the severance of loved ones,
For the loss of faithful friends.

The blooming cheek of beauty
He smites with slow decay;
The raven locks of manhood
He surely streaks with gray.

At each step on life's ladder
That we essay to climb,
He's always close behind us,
Old, ruthless Father Time.

"I think I'll get married," said Penelope to herself, as she sat in a quiet corner on the veranda of the Seaside hotel.

Penelope was young and pretty. No level-headed person would ever have thought of making an assertion that, by any possibility, could be construed as contradictory to such plausable facts. And every man at the hotel was heels over head in love with her.

After having reached this important matrimonial decision, she charged along the piazza, so wrapt in her cogitations that at a sharp turn she bumped, with considerable violence, into Tom Hathaway.

"Oh!" she gasped, "I beg your pardon! I—"

"You can't have it," interrupted Tom. "There's no reason why I should give it to you. It was delightful."

"Tom Hathaway, aren't you ashamed—"

"Not at all," said Tom. "Let's play golf."

"But it's so hot," protested Penelope. "Even the caddies are asleep."

"Never mind," said Tom. "Then we'll have the links all to ourselves. Come along."

Tom was on his knees, making her tee, when it happened. Penelope stood close by him. Suddenly he seized her hand.

"Penelope, dearest, for a long time I have wanted to tell you something. I want to say" (he fervently kissed her hand) "that I—"

"Oh, Tom!" screamed Penelope. "Whatever is the matter?"

Tom had jumped to his feet and was wildly grabbing at his mouth and choking. He had planted a passionate kiss on a wad of damp sand that, in his excitement, he had pressed into her hand.

"Hello, what's up?" and Bob Hamilton, who had heard Penelope scream, came running out of the club house.

"I—I guess Tom has some sand in his mouth," said Penelope.

"Good," said Bob; "it's good for his digestion. But how on earth—"

He stopped short. Neither of his listeners was in a condition to utter an intelligible answer. Tom made a break for the pump, and Penelope was sitting on the ground, sobbing with laughter.

"What in heaven's name is the matter with Tom?" asked Bob, after she had in a measure recovered her composure.

"He just had an accident," she replied.

"Oh, all right," said Bob. "If you don't want to tell, I don't want to know. Let's take a walk."

They promenaded lazily until they came upon a secluded bench. They sat and chatted, and his arm crept toward her waist, much to the consternation of an old gardener, who unobserved behind them was sprinkling the lawn with a hose.

"There is something I have long wanted to say to you," began Bob.

"Oh, dear!" sighed Penelope to herself. "They all begin the same way."

"I want to tell you a secret, darling," he said, approaching near to her lips than her ear.

Seized her hand.

The poor gardener was so perturbed at Bob's words and actions that he nervously dropped the hose.

Bob opened his mouth to make the rest of his declaration, and was astounded to receive in it an inch stream of water. Gasping and spluttering, he struggled to his feet. In mad consternation, the gardener clutched the offending hose and disappeared.

Penelope gazed at Bob with stunned horror and surprise.

"You—you are not having a fit, are you, Bob?" she asked tremulously

"Some careless damn fool—" sputtered Bob.

"Beg pardon!" exclaimed Fred Chase, another of the Devoted Circle, suddenly coming into view, with a pair of oars over his shoulder. "Penelope, I'm ashamed of you. I didn't think you would tolerate profanity—even from Bob," he tacked on with good-natured sarcasm.

Bob glared at him, and, without a word to either of them, stalked away.

"What's the rip with Bob?" asked Fred. "He looks out of sorts."

"He feels a little tired," she said drily. "Is it nice rowing?" she added quickly, anxious to divert his attention from poor Bob.

"It is if you have a parasol and are prepared to lie quite still," he said. "Come and try it, anyway."

As she sank down on the boat cushions, she gave a little sigh. "I suppose he couldn't have gone on after that," she murmured half loud.

"Eh, what's that?" asked Fred.

"I was thinking how handsome you look in that hat," she replied calmly.

"Thanks," said Fred. "The same to you and many of them."

"You don't talk connectedly, Fred," commented Penelope.

"How could I," suddenly burst out Fred, "with you so near me? Penelops, dear, I want a wife."

"He's original, at any rate," thought Penelope.

"And you, darling, ever since that day—"

"Look where you're going, Fred!" shrieked Penelope.

It was too late. The boat crashed into a rock that stood half out of the water. The boat stopped. Fred didn't. He kept on going and landed on his back several feet the other side of the rock.

"Fred, oh, Fred, are you drowned?" cried Penelope.

"You were going to say?" she said, softly.

But it happened that Fred was not drowned. He presently reappeared, standing in about four feet of water. Nevertheless, Malarack Hartford, who, from the shore, had witnessed the latter part of the incident, jumped into somebody's boat and pulled frantically for the scene of the disturbance. He first made sure than Penelope was not hurt, and then rowed over to Fred, who was busily engaged in wiping the water from his face and cursing himself heartily.

"Too bad, old man," said Malarack. "Jump into the boat and I'll take you to Penelope."

"No," said Fred, "I'm too—wet. You take her ashore, old chap, and I'll be everlastingly obliged to you. I'll take your boat."

Malarack was not at all reluctant to make the change, and soon had Penelope on terra firma.

"Do let us walk under the trees," said Penelope. "So much has happened to me to-day that my nerves are quite on edge."

Malarack assented. As they strolled along, Malarack suddenly turned and said:

"Penelope, there is something I have wanted to say to you for a long while. I—"

"Wait!" cried Penelope, with sudden decision. "Sit down on that bench."

Malarack stared at her curiously and complied.

"You won't fall off, will you?" asked Penelope.

"I should hope not," said Malarack, looking at her in blank surprise.

"Please put that parasol over your shoulder," directed Penelope.

Malarack did so, eyeing her nervously.

"Have you any sand in your pockets?" she suddenly demanded.

"Penelope!" he began severely.

"There! It's all right now," said Penelope, sinking down beside him. Malarack, after all, was the one she would have chosen, she thought. "You were going to say?" she said softly.

"Eh? Oh, yes," replied Malarack. "I have been waiting to tell you, as an old friend, that you really powder your nose too heavily. Now, I hope—good Heavens! Penelope, what ails you?"

Penelope had fainted.

GRIEVED HIM TO PAY TWICE.

How Two Dollars Spoiled an Afternoon for Russell Sage.

Russell Sage seldom takes any amusement. His pleasure is working and gathering in the gold eagles. Yet Uncle Russell not only had to pay for tickets for an entertainment, but he had to pay the second time.

A few years ago Miss Helen Gould gave a lawn fete at Lynhurst on Hudson for the benefit of the navy branch of the Young Men's Christian association. The tickets of admission were $1 each. Mr. and Mrs. Sage are close friends of Miss Gould, and she often entertains them. Mr. Sage bought two tickets.

On the afternoon of the lawn fete he and Mrs. Sage left New York for Irvington, and thence went to Miss Gould's by stage. Miss Gould's orders were that no one should be admitted to the grounds without a ticket. The police were on hand to enforce this command.

The stage that Mr. and Mrs. Sage came in was full of people. Tickets were demanded, and every one showed his excepting Mr. Sage. He fumbled around in all his pockets, and kept the stage and its occupants waiting for about five minutes.

Finally he said: "I'm Russell Sage. I bought two tickets, but I have forgotten to bring them."

The ticket man replied: "Miss Gould's order is that every one must have a ticket. You are blocking the way; so please give me $2 or stay out."

Mr. Sage reached down deep and brought out two old dollar bills and handed them to the ticket man, heaving a heavy sigh. The saddest part of the story was that Mr. Sage found the two missing tickets after he was in the grounds.

At Rest.

Servant of God, well done!
Rest from thy loved employ!
The battle fought, the victory won,
Enter thy Master's joy.
The voice at midnight came,
He started up to hear,
A mortal arrow pierced his frame;
He fell, but felt no fear.

Tranquil amidst alarms,
It found him on the field,
A veteran slumb'ring on his arms
Beneath his red-cross shield.
His sword was in his hand,
Still warm with recent fight;
Ready that moment, at command,
Through rock and steel to smite.

At midnight came the cry,
"To meet thy God prepare!"
He woke, and caught his Captain's eye,
Then, strong in faith and prayer,
His spirit with a bound
Burst its encumbering clay;
His tent, at sunrise, on the ground,
A darkened ruin lay.

The pains of death are past;
Labor and sorrow cease,
And life's long warfare closed at last,
His soul is found in peace.
Soldier of Christ, well done!
Praise be thy new employ;
And while eternal ages run,
Rest in thy Saviour's joy.

No Children in Japan.

There are no children in Japan. They are dignified burlesques on the grown-ups. The little girls of the family take care of the babies by having them strapped to their backs. Nearly every maid of 5 or 6 has a baby tied to her back and perhaps that accounts for the bent back and tottering gait of the Japanese woman. Though one never hears a Jap baby cry, if one begins to make a mouth and wrinkles up its funny little face, its child-mother quiets it by raising her body on her toes and heels as fast as she can, and placidity reigns in short order. A man would feel like a fool quoting "Mother Goose" to a Japanese child or trying to amuse it as one does our children. As for chucking one under the chin, that's unthinkable.

Countess to the Rescue.

The Countess Cassini at the bazaar that she recently held in Washington for the benefit of the Russian Red Cross was conversing with the ratner elderly wife of a Senator when a third lady drew near.

"How do you do, Countess? Mrs. Blank, how do you do?" said the third lady. And then she added, in a spiteful tone: "You look older to-day than usual, Mrs. Blank."

Poor Mrs. Blank blushed, but the Russian Countess came to her rescue gallantly.

"Well," she said, laughing, "why shouldn't she? She is older to-day than she ever was before in her life."—Denver Times.

Pleased With the Prospect.

Sheriff Dienst of Labette county recently took Rastus Rose, a photographer, to the insane asylum at Osawatomie. Mr. Rose was pleased with much that he saw along the road. He continually regretted the absence of his camera, which prevented him from preserving the beautiful landscapes through which the train was passing. Arriving at Osawatomie, he was enraptured with the gardens and shrubbery surrounding the asylum. "You like it, do you?" asked the sheriff. "Like it! Like it!" exclaimed the prisoner. "Why, if I'd known it was like this, I'd have gone crazy a year ago."—Kansas City Journal.

TOO KEEN A BARGAINER.

Woman Shopper Overreached Herself in Her Eagerness.

The late Levi Z. Leiter now and then used to narrate incidents of his early life as a clerk in a dry goods shop of Leitersburg, Md. With one of these incidents, as with a parable, Mr. Leiter would often illustrate some point he wished to make.

"Be frugal and careful in your dealings," he said to a young business man one day, "but never be grasping. Never try to overreach. Such courses too often make a man ridiculous, and give him besides a bad reputation that lasts all his life.

"A reputation of this kind was acquired in a moment in our Leitersburg store by a woman, and she could never shake it off.

"This woman came into the store and said to me, in the presence of a good-sized crowd of people:

"'How much is this guimpe, young man?'

"'One dollar a yard, ma'am,' said I.

"But she was slightly deaf. She misunderstood me.

"'Two dollars a yard?' she exclaimed. 'Well, it ain't worth it. I'll give ye a dollar and a half, and that's all I'll give.'

"'One dollar, ma'am, is the price,' I repeated in a louder key.

"'Oh,' she said. 'That's much too high. I'll give ye 75 cents.'"

The Rue-Anemone.

Under an oak tree in a woodland, where
The dreaming spring had dropped it from her hair,
I found a flower, through which I seemed to gaze
Beyond the world and see what no man dare
Behold and live—the myths of bygone days:
Diana and Endymion and the bare
Slim beauty of the boy whom Echo wooed,
And Hyacinthus, whom Apollo dewed
With love and death, and Daphne, ever fair,
And that reed-slender girl whom Pan pursued.

I stood and gazed, and through it seemed to see
The Dryad's feet dance by the forest tree,
Her hair wild blown; the Faun, with listening ear,
Deep in the boscage, kneeling on one knee,
Watching the wandered Oread draw near.
Her wild heart beating like a honey bee
Within a rose—all, the myths of old,
All, all the bright shapes of the age of gold,
Peopling the wonder worlds of poetry,
Through it I seemed in fancy to behold.

What other flower that, fashioned like a star,
Draws its frail life from earth and braves the war
Of all the heavens, can suggest the dreams
That this suggests, in whom no trace of mar
Or soil exists; where stainless innocence seems
Enshrined, and where, beyond our vision far,
That inaccessible beauty which the heart
Worships as truth and holiness and art
Is symbolized; wherein embodied are
The things that make the soul's immortal part?

—Lippincott's.

Biblical Injunction Reversed.

Most farmers, and especially boys, take trouble to hunt down a snake when they are really the farmers' friends Many person will leave a carriage or team in the road to kill a snake they see upon the roadside. And as for the blacksnake that lives under the house or old porch, it is a greater enemy to mice and rats than the best cat could possibly be, while it would not harm an infant; in fact, could be tamed to be very interesting. Kindness always wins snakes, and they will show it as perceptibly as most creatures. A blacksnake pet is more cleanly than a dog or cat, is far less trouble, will respond to the familiar call just as quickly, show every evidence of affection as sincerely, and if its fangs should scratch the skin or even penetrate the flesh the result is not so annoying as the scratches from the briars that come from picking roses or blackberries.—Easton (Md.) Gazette.

She Called It Living.

It is strange to mark the contrast of existence between two people living practically side by side with each other. Into the fortunes of one so much is crowded—changes, events and various happenings—so that a decade of the life of this one is more than the allotted threescore and ten of the other. "Nothing has ever happened to me," said a girl of twenty-three, rather discontentedly, "and just see what Mildred S—— has had! We left school together at eighteen. Since then she has been engaged, broke it off, become engaged again, married, quarrelled with her husband, got a divorce, and is now back home again with all that behind her, while I have been going on exactly the same."

"But you certainly do not think her lot an enviable one?" queried her mother, laughing.

"No," said the girl, doubtfully; "but it was living. I don't know but that is better than merely existing."

Forced Contribution.

Not long ago in New York some philanthropic effort was started in a church to raise funds, and it was decided to have a special sermon and collection. Mr. H—— was appointed one of the members to pass the plate. Meeting a friend on Broadway, and being very anxious for a large collection, he urged his attendance. The friend was compelled to leave the city that very day, but stated that he had given his wife a five-dollar bill for the collection.

As the plate was passed, the lady put in $3. Mr. H——, instead of passing on, stopped and, in an undertone, said:

"No you don't. I want the other $2. You krow your husband gave you $5."

The lady, very much astonished, said:

"Do move on, Mr. H——"

"No," replied H——, "I'll remain here till I get the other $2."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

In the Sunny South

Here is an example of typical southern politeness:

Two miles out of Memphis a big steam automobile was running along a beautiful country road. It was driven by its owner, who, in order to make it impossible to identify him, may be called Col. Jones.

Half a mile away appeared a light buggy, drawn by a nervous horse and driven by a young southerner who was taking his sweetheart out for a ride in the soft spring air. When the horse spied the approaching automobile it cut a few didos. Col. Jones instantly brought his machine to a full stop as near the side of the road as possible, there being a deep ditch on either side the central driveway.

All went well until the horse reached the auto, when, apparently out of pure nervousness, it pranced a little. Then the youthful driver, anxious to prove to the young woman at his side that he was master of the situation, drew his whip and struck the already frightened horse a heavy blow. Instantly the animal plunged sideways. The wheels left the roadbed, the driver flew out of the buggy and struck the soft [illegible] off. On top of the [illegible] of her escort the y[illegible] ed.

Man Toyed with Fate

In the armies of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the custom of casting lots to decide what soldiers should be punished for the offenses of all was common. At Winchester, England, in 1645, complaint was made that after the surrender there had been unfair plundering. Six soldiers were tried and found guilty and it was decided by lot which one of the six should be hanged. At Tangiers in 1663, and again in 1665, two soldiers had to cast dice on a drumhead and he who threw the least was executed. Thomas May's translation of Barclay's "Icon Animorum" gives a curious story of this sort. Speaking of English courage, he says that during the war in the Netherlands some soldiers of the Spanish party were taken prisoners by the Dutch, who decided to make reprisals for the previous cruelty of their enemies. Out of four-and-twenty men eight were to be hanged. "There were lots, therefore, thrown into a helmet," says May, "and the prisoners were commanded to draw their fortunes—whoever should draw a blank was to escape, but whoever should draw a black lot was to be hanged presently.

"They were all," says May, "possessed with a great apprehension of their present danger, especially the Spaniard. Their pitiful wishes and tears in some of the standers-by move pity, in others laughter; [illegible] was besides in that danger [illegible] lishman, a common soldier, who, [illegible] a careless countenance, expressing [illegible] fear at death at all, came bold[illegible] the helmet and drew his lot. May further relates that "the [illegible] consented to the madman's re[illegible] who valued his life at so low a [illegible] and he again drew a safe lot," [illegible] seems rather to regret the [illegible] escape of the foolhardy Englis[illegible] whom he denounces as "a wret[illegible] worthy not only of that double [illegible] even of a single preservation, [illegible] basely had undervalued his life.

Old Man's One Regret

Dean Hart of Denver contributes to the Outlook's Annual Recreation Number an entertaining article called "A Day's Fishing in Colorado," in the course of which he tells this story:

They had a fishing club in one of the middle states; the keeper and factotum of the club was "Old Sammy." Despite his healthful occupation age grew on him, and unable longer to "watch" the river, there was only one place for the lone old man—the county house. Here, as the end was surely coming, the pastor of the church was asked to see him To meet the Great Proprietor with a vast accumulation of debt is an ordeal that every wise man may well dread, and seek to prepare for. The man with the gospel, trying to induce Sam to see the prime necessity of [illegible] the cliff to touch the place of [illegible] was leading him to admit his [illegible] rupt condition, that he might [illegible] mercy of him whose "property [illegible] have mercy and to forgive." It's Policy, You Know

When a man comes home quite late
In a rather boozy state
How his wife will welt it to him with her tongue!
And he'll sit there calm and mute
While she tells him he's a brute,
Just the greatest beast that ever went unhung!
Let him hint he has his eyes
On a hat about her size,
Down her cheeks the damp, repentant tears will flow,
And she'll clasp him in her arms
And dilate upon his charms—
It is policy to do it, don't you know.

In her home a pretty girl,
One you'd think a priceless pearl,
Will be spiteful, cross and surly as a bear,
She will snap at her mamma,
Scold her venerable pa
And will pull her little brother's tousled hair;
But when Freddie comes to woo
She will smile and bill and coo,
Not a trace of ugly temper will she show;
She'll be gentle as a dove,
Little lambkin thrilled with love—
It is policy to do it, don't you know.
Many men engaged in trade
Lay their scruples in the shade
And will skin their fellow men a good deal,
They will play their cards to win,
Even to the verge of sin,
And the slightest prick of conscience never feel.
Then upon the Sabbath day
To the church will wend their way
And the praises from their pious will flow,
They will sing and lead in prayer
With a humble Christian air—
It is policy to do it, don't you know.

Thus it is the country o'er;
If you probe them to the core
Many men you'll find who lead a double life,
Yet they half way think it's right
That to win the earthly fight
They must use deceptive weapons in the strife.
When their final race is run,
When their mortal work is done
And they hear the summons calling them to go,
It should be their last request
In asbestos to be dressed—
'Twould be policy to do it, don't you know.

War Spirit of Japan

The Daily Express prints an interesting letter from its Tokio correspondent on the spirit and temper of the Japanese people in the present war. One striking instance is that of a widow who committed suicide when she discovered that her only son refrained from volunteering because he was her sole support. Another story, told the correspondent at the war office in Tokio was of seven old men who sent a letter written in their blood begging that, as military regulations debarred them from serving in the regular army, they might be allowed to form a "battotal," or battalion of swordsmen, who in [illegible] times rushed at the enemy [illegible] blades unsheathed. Numbers of [illegible] ters have also been received [illegible] schoolboys under the age limit [illegible] ing to go to the front as servants [illegible] in any capacity. Discipline, [illegible] gence and equipment are powerful [illegible] sets in a national struggle, but [illegible] renders the Japanese so peculiarly [illegible] formidable is that their efficiency [illegible] backed by a fervid patriotism [illegible] mating all ranks and ages. The [illegible] tion forms one vast forlorn hope.—Spectator.

Joy Cemetery of Dublin, he says: "No, Mr. Parnell, a mighty will does not make every great man safe." What shall fathers tell their boys? That a weak will is the better for them? Nay, verily. Great force is to the boy what momentum is to the rifle ball. A boy without will cannot live. He needs every ounce he can acquire, but this alone will not make him morally safe or spiritually strong. The hope of a man is not in his family, not in his force, nor yet is it in his furnishings, which I use as the equivalent for the will of man. John says neither the individual nor the world will be saved by its furnishings. When Jonah went to Nineveh, one of the reasons for his going was that 120,000 people needed education—"they could not tell their right hand from their left." That same cry goes up to-day. Only educate and train; that is sufficient. Your section is not so whitewashed with this system of ethical culture as some others I know. But we never can emphasize too often or too positively the denial tenet of Christ's creed that what a man needs primarily is not accession of brain, but a fresh heart; not illumination, but reconstruction, the establishment in him by grace of something that is not in him by nature. Illumination of the brain is never clarification of the heart. There was a man in our American life who was born of the best family, with a personal force that commanded men and captivated women, whose furnishings could scarcely be surpassed, and yet there has not walked across the pages of American history a blacker hearted villian than Aaron Burr. I am as far as possible from saying that knowledge makes a man worse; my only contention is that it has not in itself the power of making men better. Ideas, education alone, can neither reconstruct the life nor recreate the heart.

This is a thoughtful age; men are brainy; all about us there is a passion for new ideas; but our most urgent necessity is not of idea but of power. What we need most of all is not schooling but baptism, and that is to come through faith.

What is this faith that is to give us the supreme victory and insure our safety? It is at this distinct point that we begin to learn the real meaning and purpose of faith. Every little while I am told by one and another that he would like to have faith in this particular matter in regard to the Bible, or in regard to Christ in the future life as though if his mind could only be brought intellectually to consent to it, the consummation would be reached and a great result achieved. Being prepared to assert to this or that particular statement in regard to Christ, for example, is a very distinct thing from faith. Faith is personal attitude, personal relationship. Faith is such a personal yielding of ourselves to another as brings us into living contact with that other and so makes us recipient of what it lies in that other to confer. The child becomes like his father by faith in his father, because his faith is that inward surrender that makes him susceptible to every impression that goes forth from his father. A child's faith toward his mother is not faith that what his mother says is true; it is faith in his mother, the hiding of himself in the one life that enwraps them both, so that he lives in the sweep of her inspiration and grows up toward manhood by the appropriation of personal vigor, wisdom and sweetness hourly made over him. And that is cast in the same mold as Gospel faith, which is as a cord by which the living Christ holds the believer to Himself. Faith is not a condition wherein we hold to something or somebody, as that in which we are held by something or somebody. It is not holding a doctrine, but being held by a person. "I know whom I have believed." The iron filings stick to the magnet, not because they try so hard to stick, but because they are mastered by the magnet.

Faith, then, has for its very essence a personal self-commitment, one ounce of which is worth a whole ton of intellectual affirmation. It is this sense of being held by God that makes a man safe and secure. I do not know how the grace of God can take a man like Saul of Tarsus and make him Paul the Apostle; but no man will question his knowledge when he says: "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." That is exactly what John B. Gough cried as he went like a flaming torch blazing the way for a multitude of hopeless drunkards. The hope, and the only hope, for us all is in the grace of God. If I were to strike a tuning fork on this desk and hold it to my ear not one in this room could hear the sound thereof, but I could hear it and tune my violin. Strike it again and instead of holding it to my ear, set it upon this desk. Instantly the sound would be heard everywhere. Now what do you hear? Not the tuning fork for the tuning fork makes no louder sound the second time than it did the first. What do you hear? You hear this hard wood desk, which has no music in itself, but just as soon as it comes in contact with a musical instrument it itself becomes musical and delights every one that has music in his soul.

The individual life may be insignificant alone by itself; it may come from a good family or a bad; it may have great force or little; it may have choice furnishings or not; but the safety and security of all will depend upon the personal self surrender to the Son of God, who alone has the power to make them Sons of God, which are born not of a family or of force or of furnishings, but of faith.

Power of an Ideal.

A beautiful statue once stood in the market place of an Italian city. It was the statue of a Greek slave girl. It represented the slave as tidy, well dressed and handsome. A ragged, unkempt, forlorn street child, coming across the statue in her play, stopped and gazed at it in admiration. She was entranced and captivated by it. She gazed long and admiringly. Moved by a sudden impulse, she went home and washed her face and combed her hair. Another day she stopped again before the same statue and admired it, and received new inspiration. Next day her tattered clothes were washed and mended. Each time she looked at the statue she found something in its beauties until she was a transformed child.—Treasury of Religious Thought.

Wanted: "A Positive Gospel.

It is the preacher of positive faith and conviction who most deeply impresses a congregation and who has the greatest staying power among a people. Neutrality of belief and statement does not commend him to the public. A firm grip of truth makes him strong and vigorous in preaching and influential in and persuasive in spirit and activity. The more clear cut he is in his views of Bible doctrine and practice, the more ready are choice and intelligent souls to accept him as their religious guide, and the greater their combined influence in the community in which it is centered. A larger enthusiasm is quickened among its adherents, and a growing increase in the number of recruits is sure to follow his faithful and zealous ministry.—The Presbyterian.

The First Result of Effort.

Every real and searching effort of self-improvement is of itself a lesson of profound humility. For we cannot move a step without learning and feeling the waywardness, the weakness, the vacillation of our movements or without desiring to be set upon the Rock that is higher than ourselves.—William Ewart Gladstone.

Exalt Our Lives.

We reduce life to the pettiness of our daily living; we should exalt our living to the grandeur of life.—Phillips Brooks.

The help of God is the only hope of man.

TORTURING PAIN.

Half This Man's Sufferings Would Have Killed Many a Person. But Doan's Cured Him.

A. C. Sprague, stock dealer, of Normal, Ill., writes: "For two whole years I was doing nothing but buying medicines to cure my kidneys. I do not think that any man ever suffered as I did and lived. The pain in my back was so bad that I could not sleep at night. I could not ride a horse, and sometimes was unable even to ride in a car. My condition was critical when I sent for Doan's Kidney Pills. I used three boxes and they cured me. Now I can go anywhere and do as much as anybody. I sleep well and feel no discomfort at all."

IN THE BARREN LANDS.

Caspar Whitney's Experiences in an Unhospitable Region.

The Barren Lands, called by the Indians "Land of Little Sticks," are absolutely devoid, not only of trees, but even of brush, except for some stunted bushes to be found in occasional spots near the water's edge. These lands lie in British Columbia, near the Great Slave Lake. Mr. Casper Whitney, in describing a hunting trip through this region, in "Musk-Ox, Bison, Sheep and Goat," says that a venture into this north country, except in summer, means a struggle with both cold and famine. Yet the lack of food was not so hard to bear as the wind, and camping was a continual discomfort.

"One of the first lessons I learned," writes Mr. Whitney, "was to keep my face free from covering, and also as clean shaven as possible under such circumstances. It makes me smile now to remember the elaborate hood arrangement which was knitted for me in Canada, and which then seemed to me one of the most important articles of my equipment. It covered the entire head, ears and neck, with openings only for the eyes and mouth, and in town I had viewed it as a great find, but I threw it away before I got within a thousand miles of the Barren Grounds.

"The reason is obvious. My breath turned the front of the hood into a sheet of ice before I had run three miles; and as there was no fire in the Barren Grounds to thaw it, of course it was an impossible thing to wear in that region. After other experiments, I found the simplest and most comfortable headgear to be my own long hair, which hung even with my jaw, bound about just above the ears with a handkerchief, and the open hood of my caribou skin capote drawn forward over all.

"The most trying hour in the twenty-four was at the camping time in the afternoon. The fire furnished no warmth; it was not built for that purpose; it was simply to boil the tea, and perhaps an idea of its size can be given by saying that by the time the snow in the kettle had melted into water and the water begun to boil the fire was exhausted.

"Having drunk the tea, we rolled up in our robes, lying side by side round the tepee, with feet toward the fire and head against the sledge, knees into the back of the man next to you, and with your snowshoes under your head, away from the dogs that would eat the lacing.

"Sleep never came until the dogs had finished fighting over us, for as soon as we were rolled into our robes the dogs poured into the tepee. There were twenty-eight dogs, and the lodge was about seven feet in diameter at its base. No hour in the day or night was more miserable than this, when these half-starved brutes fought over and on top of us before they finally settled down upon us.

"In extremely cold weather a dog curled up at your feet or back is not unpleasant; but to have one lying on your head, another on your shoulders or hips, or perhaps a third on your feet, and you lying on your side on rocky, uneven ground, is not a happy experience."

The cost of the coronation of King Edward VII, establishes a record for modern times. It was considered until recently a lordly and magnificent thing for the subjects of George IV. to spend $605,000. William IV. and Queen Adelaide were content with a modest $250,000. It is not easy to understand in what King Edward's $1,795,000 was sunk.

Last year Oscar Zeller, of Zossen, started on foot from Berlin for a trip around the world. His plan was to go via Mukden, Vladivostock and Japan to America. The war frustrated that plan, and he has now started for Bering straits, along the northernmost Siberian telegraph line. His success is considered very doubtful.

When a native lady enters a Japanese railway carriage she slips her feet from her tiny shoes, stands upon the seat and then demurely sits with her feet doubled beneath her. A moment later she lights a cigarette or her little pipe, which holds just tobacco enough to produce two good whiffs of smoke. When the ticket collector, attired in a blue uniform, enters the carriage he removes his cap and twice bows politely. He repeats the bow as he comes to each passenger to collect the tickets.

The warm wave over the west has spread all over the country between the Mississippi river and the Rocky mountains and also over the southern states. It was particularly severe in South Dakota, where maximum temperatures reached 100 degrees. In the cotton belt the average maximum was 90 degrees and above, except in the Atlanta district, where it was not so warm. The maximum at Birmingham was 90 degrees.

When a Japanese girl marries she is taught that she is to reverence and obey her husband's relatives, his mother and father, as she has reverenced and obeyed her own parents. She must be able to cook rice properly, and her being unable to do so is considered not in the light of mere ignorance, but almost as a mortal sin; a young wife ignorant of the proper fulfilling of this domestic duty would very likely be returned to her parents' home.

One of the largest and most noticeable business signs seen anywhere is that of the National Casket Co. on their mammoth new factory at Nashville, Tenn., made on a wire frame with aluminum letters six feet high and one hundred feet long, which can be read from a long distance by day, and when reproduced in electric lights, can be read even further at night. This is the concern that is called on to furnish Caskets for the most prominent people everywhere, including among its recent orders, Caskets for Presidents William McKinley, Benjamin Harrison and the late lamented Gen. John B. Gordon, and yet whose goods can be had through the smallest undertaker in every town. From the fact that they are called on to furnish Caskets for the best citizens everywhere, there must be some merit in their claim that their goods are the best, and the South should be proud to have a branch of such a high class establishment within her borders.

Miss Hapgood tells how was cured of Fallopian and Ovarian mation—and escaped an awful o by using Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I suffered for four years with what the doctors called Salpingitis (inflammation of the fallopian tubes) and ovaritis, which are most distressing and painful ailments, affecting all the surrounding parts, undermining the constitution, and sapping the life forces. If you had seen me a year ago, before I began taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and had noticed the sunken eyes, sallow complexion, and general emaciated condition, and compared that person with me as I am today, robust, hearty and well, you would not wonder that I feel thankful to you and your wonderful medicine, which restored me to new life and health in five months, and saved me from an awful operation."—MISS IRENE HAPGOOD, 1022 Sandwich St., Windsor, Ont.

Ovaritis or inflammation of the ovaries or fallopian tubes which adjoin the ovaries may result from sudden stopping of the monthly flow, from inflammation of the womb, and many other causes. The slightest indication of trouble with the ovaries, indicated by dull throbbing pain in the side, accompanied by heat and shooting pains, should claim your instant attention. It will not cure itself, and a hospital operation, with all its terrors, may easily result from neglect.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I can truly say that you have saved my life, and I cannot express my gratitude to you in words.

"Before I wrote to you telling how I felt, I had doctored for over two years steady and spent lots of money in medicine besides, but it all failed to do me any good. My menses did not appear in that time, and I suffered much pain. I would daily have fainting spells, headache, backache and bearing down pain, and was so weak that it was hard for me to do my work.

"I used your medicine and treatment as directed, and after taking three bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, menses appeared, my womb troubles left me, and I have been regular ever since. I used fourteen bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and Blood Purifier together, and am now restored to perfect health. Had it not been for you, I would have been in my grave.

"I will always recommend your wonderful remedies, and hope that these few lines may lead others who suffer as I did to try your remedies."—MRS. T. C. WILLADSEN, R. R. No. 1, Manning, Iowa.

Such unquestionable testimony proves the power of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound over diseases of women.

Women should remember that they are privileged to consult Mrs. Pinkham at Lynn, Mass., about their illness, entirely free.

JAPANESE LOST 28000

In Assaults on Port Arthnr. They are Reinforced with 30,000 from the North

800 SHELLS DAILY ARE FIRED

Russians Explode Mines Under Their Assailants—10,000 Lost in One Charge.

According to a Moscow correspondent, Lieutenant General Stoessel concluded a telegram to an intimate friend with the words: "Farewell forever, Port Arthur will be my tomb."

It is reported that Russia is trying to induce France to buy Argentine and Chilean men of war.

The following is supplied by a Russian correspondent:

"With each additional report from Port Arthur wonder increases both at the persistence of the Japanese attack and the heroic stubbornness of the defenders of the fortress. The Japanese are literally throwing away sands of lives in the hope of the courage of the Russian t fident the fortress can not but that if it is taken the who.. anese army will have to immolate itself on the slopes of the fortifications.

There were five desperate assaults on Green Hills July 26th, the Japanese returning each time with apparently inexhaustible reinforcements. On the final assault, however, the Japanese broke badly, throwing away their guns, cartridge belts and even their boots to facilitate their flight and leaving seven thousand dead or wounded.

It is asserted in reliable quarters at Port Arthur that the Japanese have received reinforcements of thirty thousand men from the north.

Pigeon bay had been the scene of fighting for several days before the final assault had begun, the Japanese never being able to hold for long any territory they might gain. Their attacks were mostly at night, during foggy days and misty mornings.

The Japanese believe their superior physical condition will win the battle for them by wearing out the Russian garrison.

NO DEFENSE

Offered by Russia in the Hipsang Case.

Evidence given before a naval court shows the shelling and sinking of the steamer Hipsang by the Russians to have been a reckless and wanton act. The name of the destroyer which sunk the Hipsang is not known. No provocation of any kind for the sinking of the steamer has been given. She was on her regular course from New Chwang to Che Foo and her lights were burning.

May Try Again.

News that the Port Arthur squadron has again sallied out is expected at any hour, as Rear Admiral Prince Oukhomsky's orders are imperative to go out or destroy his ships beyond the possibility of repair before the fortress falls.

"CHAIR FORT" FALLS

Giving Japan an Added Advantage at Port Arthur. Russians Leave Itzshan.

THE MIDDLE FORTIFICATION

It is Only a Mile and a Half from Port Arthur and Second Only to Golden Hill.

The Japanese captured "Chair Fort" of the Port Arthur defenses Monday after a tremendous attack.

Etseshan fort is almost in the center of the chain of forts, of which it forms one, defending Port Arthur, from which it is only about a mile and a half distant. It occupies a commanding position and is possibly only second in importance to the Golden Hill fort.

It was announced Monday that the Japanese had swept the Russians from Pigeon bay and had captured the northernmost fort of the western line of inner defenses.

The Russians have been driven from Itzshan and the Japanese are very close to the southern forts and the eastern defenses.

The Russians believe that a fifth of the army before Porth Arthur is a small estimate of the Japanese losses up to date.

Despite the popular feeling that Port Arthur is doomed, the success with which Lieutenant General Stoessel has been beating off the Japanese assaults and the heavy losses suffered by the besiegers offer considerable encouragement to the Russians.

PAPER BURNED OUT.

Thought to Have Been the Work of a Fire Bug.

At Rockford, the office of the Argus, a weekly paper was burned Monday night. The Argus outfit consisted of a complete plant and there was on hand a fine assortment of stationery. The loss will reach nearly $2,000. The fire is believed to be the work of an incendiary. Editor J. W. Brooks recently received an anonymous letter containing a threat to burn him out, but thinking some one was merely trying to run a "bluff" on him he gave the matter little thought.

SHERIFF OPENED THE DOOR.

So Says an Affidavit of a Soldier at Stateboro.

The affidavit of Sergeant R. B. Sullivan, of company L, says:

"I saw Sheriff Kendrick down at the jail in Statesboro after the prisoners had been lynched. I asked him why he opened the door to the prisoners' room. He replied: 'Well, they were going in there anyhow. What was the use of letting them break up state property?' He was referring to the fact that they would have broken down the door."

CLEARED AT PRELIMINARY.

But the Grand Jury Has Indicted Him for Murder.

Dr. John B. Farley, a physician and merchant of Farley station, was arrested and placed in jail on a charge of murder in the first degree. He killed Davis Johnson last Christmas and was dismissed after preliminary hearing, the court holding it to have been justifiable homicide.

The last grand jury indicted him. Dr. Farley will demand an immediate trial at the present term of court

Killed by the Cars.

D. P. Bibb, a white man about 40 years of age, was run over in the Louisville and Nashville railroad yards at Birmingham.

Ovens Out; No Coal.

The one battery of coke ovens at Brookside that has been in operation since the strike commenced went out of commission yesterday for the want of coal. New Jail.

Tuscaloosa's board of mayor and aldermen decided to build a new city prison on the site back of the present building.

A report from Paris states that Russian revolutionaries declare that the Czarina's child was a girl, not a boy, and that the son of a peasant was substituted. The peasant woman, they say, was smuggled into the royal palace a few days before the Czarina's accouchment was expected. The czarina' child, a girl, was given to the peasant woman and the peasant's child, a boy, was placed in the royal cradle

COTTON OUTLOOK GOOD.

Crop in Better Condition Than Last Week—Picking Begins.

The weekly crop report issued by the weather bureau says:

The drouth prevailing in portions of the central valleys in the previous week has been relieved by abundant rains, but drouth continues in central and western Tennessee, and is beginning to be felt in the middle gulf states, and over a considerable part of Texas.

The principal corn states have experienced a week of favorable conditions.

The general outlook for cotton is somewhat improved as compared with the conditions the previous week, although shedding continues in every state, and rust is prevalent in the central and eastern districts. The unfavorable effects of shedding and rust, however, are less pronounced than last week. In Texas the weather conditions were favorable, but the crop continued to deteriorate as a result of rust and shedding and damage by insects. In this state injury by boll worms is decreasing, but the boll weevils continue very destructive, having caused entire absence of bloom in many localities. Picking is quite general in Texas except in the north portion.

MRS. MAYBRICK HOME.

Landed at New York Tuesday and Will Hasten to Her Home in Mobile.

On board the Vaderland, which arrived Tuesday from Antwerp, was Mrs. Florence Chandler Maybrick, recently released from prison in England.

Mrs. Maybrick was entered on the passenger list as Mrs. Rose Ingraham, a name which she took from her great grandparents. This precaution was not designed to evade official inquiry, but merely to avoid annoying observation on the part of fellow passengers.

While she made no secret of her presence on board and appeared frequently about the decks and saloon, very few were aware of her identity. She is accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Samuel V. Hayden. Mr. Hayden is her attorney.

She will visit Mobile and Norfolk at an early date.

Seaboard Independent.

The Seaboard Air Line is to be operated independently of the other southern railway systems, according to a statement made by Thomas F. Ryan, who, with Blair & Co., and T. Jefferson Coolidge, Jr., purchased 140,000 shares of the Seaboard Air Line stock.

Mr. Ryan said: "The Seaboard Air Line will be operated independently of the other railway systems of the south. The suggestion that has been variously expressed that the Atlantic Coast Line or the Southern or any other railroad interest, is directly or indirectly interested in the purchase of the Seaboard, or that the managers or owners of such properties will in any way influence the management of the Seaboard, is without the slightest foundation."

Texas Cotton.

The Galveston-Dallas News publishes reports from 522 correspondents in Texas, Oklahoma and Indian Territory on the cotton crop. These reports are of uniform date, August 1st. The summary shows that the average condition in Texas is 3.25 per cent higher than last year; Indian Territory, 25; Oklahoma, 42 higher. The News figures that the present conditions indicate productions as follows:

Texas, 2,787,129 bales; Indian Territory, 488,812; Oklahoma Territory, 23.

Time Curtailed.

The Pennsylvania Railroad company has made a sweeping reduction in the time of the men employed. The employes of the machine shops were notified that they would be divided into shifts, each shift to work every other day, eight hours to constitute a day's work.

New Cars.

Ten new cars are now building for the Birmingham Railway, Light and Power Company in St. Louis. These will be the largest yet brought to Birmingham. Each will be 45 feet in length and will have a speed of fort miles an hour.

Will Use Ensley Rails.

Steel rails made in the Ensley rail mill will be used to a large extent in the reconstruction of the Highland avenue line by the Birmingham Railway, Light and Power company. This will be the first Ensley rail used by this company.

Accounts Correct.

The office of director of archives and history, Thomas M. Owen, has just been examined by Assistant Inspector G. F. Sedberry, who, in his report to the governor, pronounced them correct

Soldiers Killed.

Two soldiers, members of the military of Durham, N. C., were instantly killed while returning from the national guard encampment near Moorehead City.

Their heads struck the covered bridge at Stoney creek. The bodies did not fall from the train.

The discovery of the accident was made by the dripping of blood past the windows.

CROP PROGRESS.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Climate and Crop Bulletin of the Weather Bureau—Alabama Section—For Week Ending August 22, 1904.

GENERAL CONDITIONS.

The week as a whole was moderately warm, comparatively dry and favorable for all maturing crops, though showers were fairly general on Tuesday and Sunday, being heavy in a few localities; high winds and hail slightly damaged crops in portions of Chilton and Randolph counties. Early cotton continues to deteriorate in middle and southern counties from effect of previous wet weather. In some fields it has shed most of its bolls, has stopped fruiting and rust is still prevalent, with some rot. Boll worms are damaging in a few localities. There is also some blight, rust and shedding in northern counties, but the crop as a whole continues promising in that portion of the state. Late cotton is improving slowly and continues to fruit fairly well, though still making too much stalk in some localities. Early cotton is opening slowly and picking will not be general for about ten days. Corn is maturing satisfactorily and promises a large yield, though wet weather has caused some lowland corn to rot. Early corn is being gathered in southern and some middle counties. Fodder pulling has been completed in some southern counties and is well under way in the middle district, with prospect of a good yield of this forage being secured, though considerable has been damaged by rain. All minor crops are doing well. The gathering of early sweet potatoes and peanuts continues in some localities, both making good yield. Wet weather has retarded haying, but grasses are growing well and pastures are excellent. More late Irish potatoes have been planted and more turnips sown. Early sown turnips are doing well. Pears and grapes are yielding fairly well, though damaged somewhat by rot.

$3,000 in Securities Taken—Nitro-Glycerine Used.

Fruitton, a small station on the Louisville and Nashville railroad, miles north of Florence, was the scene of a safe blowers Sunday morning. The burglars entered the store of T. Pruitt by battering in the front door and succeeded in getting away with $100 in cash and $3,000 in notes and checks.

A quantity of nitro-glycerine was used to effect entrance into the safe, the iron door being blown a distance of forty feet across the store, where it struck the shelves and scattered their contents. It was doubled up and twisted. A piece of fuse and some wrapping paper were the only clues left by the burglars.

BATTLE OF LIAO YANG

Now Raging with 40,000 Men Engaged. Russian Guns Captured

ARMIES ARE EVENLY BALANCED

Russians are Well Intrenched and Japanese Assaults Have Been Repeatedly Repulsed.

The great battle of Liao Yang which began early [illegible] has been raging for [illegible] days with increasing intensity. Yesterday two brief telegrams [illegible] the afternoon, have been received. Every confidence is expressed in General Kuropatkin's ability to meet the Japanese assault on ground of his own choosing, but St. Petersburg is anxiously awaiting further news of the progress of the fight. The Japanese forces engaged in this battle can only be estimated, but they are believed to number about 20,000

General Kuropatkin is known to have six army corps, besides 147 squadrons of cavalry in which great confidence is reposed, bringing up the Russian total to about the same number that the Japanese have. How the armies compare with regard to artillery is not definitely known, though throughout the war the Japanese have shown great preference for this arm and skill in its use.

Reports from the front credit the Japanese with having about 1,200 guns and many mountain batteries, and it is known that they have recently shipped 24 heavy guns to Yinkow. Four of the guns already have been mentioned in the dispatches as being in action.

General Kuropatkin, in addition to his field batteries, has a number of very heavy guns emplaced at important positions at Liao Yang, where the Russians have been strongly fortified for some time.

The Japanese claim to have captured two field batteries during the last two days. Russian official accounts admit the loss of only six guns.

It is stated that a Japanese battery was captured south of Anshanshan during the preliminary fighting and that several Japanese guns have been captured since then.

A dispatch says:

The Japanese artillery fire only ceased at 8 o'clock this evening. The casualties have not yet been ascertained.

The Russian corps repulsed a hot Japanese assault, the Japanese being driven back by bayonet charges no less than six times.

Two Japanese companies which succeeded in occupying a position were mistaken for Russians and annihilated by Japanese artillery fire

There has been an immense quantity of ammunition used throughout the day, especially on the southern front against the Russian third corps. It is believed that the Russian loss so far has been not shrdlu un [illegible] so far has not been very heavy, except in the regiments which sustained bayonet charges. All the men serving one Russian gun, except one, were killed by shrapnal. The survivor, who was badly wounded, heroically brought his gun to headquarters and then refused to quit his place until the general peremptorily ordered him.

A dispatch from Mukden says that the stubbornly fought battle which has been in progress near Liao Yang and attempts of the Japanese to turn the Russian flank have been repulsed. It is said at Mukden that the Japanese lost over ten guns, but details have not been received.

The news from Port Arthur up to August 26th was reassuring. The account of the battleship Sevastopol having gone out on August 23d to bombard the Japanese in Take bay does not mention that vessel as striking a mine.

The finance ministry has practically arranged with German bankers for a new loan of 500,000,000 roubles (approximately $250,000,000) at a higher rate of interest than that on the last loan. Only minor details remain to be settled, and the date of issue is not stated, but it is not likely that the loan will be floated until after the fall of Port Arthur.

River Gauges.

Weather Observer, L. A. Dorsch, announced that the government has approved and accepted the bids of contractors for installing river gauges at points on the Pearl and Pascagoula rivers, and their tributaries. The gauges are to be put in at once at Columbia, Hattiesburg, Merrill, Shubuta, Enterprise and Jackson and will vary in construction.

7,000 PERSONS.

Will Be Thrown Out of Employment at Pullman.

The great shops of the Pullman company are to shut down on September 1, and thousands of men employed in the various departments of the car-building corporation will be without work.

Thirty thousand people at Pullman and in the surrounding towns will be affected. When the Pullman company is working on full time, 7,000 persons are employed. During the last few months, owing to a lack of new orders, men have been laid off 300 and 400 at a time, until now the force does not aggregate more than 2,000.

These men are engaged in finishing the construction of cars already under way, and when these are ready for the rails the shops will be closed and the plant rendered idle.

The plant may remain closed for more than a month.

GRIFFIN COMES HOME.

Not Known Whether He Will be Selected Panama Secretary.

Letters received from Secretary Virgil Griffin, of the Alabama railroad commission, announces that he will be back from the canal zone, Panama.

It is not yet known whether Mr. Griffin will be selected as the clerk of the Panama judiciary or whether he will continue as secretary of the railroad commission. Secretary Griffin left Montgomery six weeks ago with Judge Osceola Kyle, who was appointed a member of the judiciary for the canal zone by the president. The intervening time Secretary Griffin has spent with Judge Kyle in his new home in Panama.

WITH AN AX

Prisoner Cuts His Way Out of Jail. Father Remained.

Ben White, who with his father, Frank White, was arrested at Jacksonville, Saturday for an assault with a knife upon Ollie Williams, succeeded in making his escape from the local prison.

White effected his escape by means of an axe which was slipped into his cell during the night by some unknown person and the local authorities are unable to discover a clue as to his whereabouts. Insisting on his innocence and having a firm faith in his acquittal by the court the elder White refused to go with his son. If young White is caught he will be removed to Anniston.

SULTAN'S BROTHER DEAD.

Declared Insane and Was in Solitary Confinement for 28 Years.

Former Sultan Murad V, of Turkey, died Monday, reports say of consumption.

It was reported in May that Murad V, the thirty-third sovereign of the house of Osman, was dying, and that his adherents all over Turkey, known as the young Turks, were secretly arming and awaited the signal to rise in insurrection.

Murad V was born in 1840, and ascended the throne after the murder of the Sultan Abdul Aziz, in 1876. In July of that year Murad was placed under the regency of his brother, the present Sultan Abdul Hammid V, and in August was dethroned. Outwardly this act was performed legally by the council of ministers, on the ground that he was insane. The real facts of the case, however, will probably never be known, but it has been claimed that Murad was a good deal more sane than his brother.

One of the greatest terrors of Abdul Hammid's existence was the fear that his brother might escape.

The confinement of Murad has been one of the cruelest character. Only his jailers were allowed to see him, and every precaution was taken to prevent any intelligence of what was going on in the outside world from reaching him.

DR. FARLEY ACQUITTED

Grand Jury Indicted Him After an Exoneration.

Dr. John R. Farley was acquited of the charge of murder in the first degree after a trial of two days in the circuit court. The jury was out twenty-seven minutes. The verdict was received with applause.

Dr. Farley killed Davis Johnson, a well known young man last Christmas. He was exonerated after a preliminary hearing. The probate court and the grand jury made a notable case of it by returning an indictment against the defendant charging first degree murder. Dr. Farley was in jail a week. He proved self defense.

It Was Brilliant.

A large meteor fell not very far east of Ellisville on Sunday night. It appeared very suddenly, like a huge ball of fire, and when seemingly close to the earth burst with a report similar to, though not quite so loud, as a cannon-cracker.

KUROPATKIN IN HOPE

Abandons Advanced Positions And Concentrates His Troops at Liao Yang.

LINES ARE CLOSER DRAWN.

Russians Being Driven Out Gradually From Port Arthur's Defenses.

All the advices from Liao Yang show that General Kuropatkin is gradually drawing in his advanced positions to the inner ring of his defenses.

After three days of heavy fighting, the latter part of which was impeded by rain, the Russians were compelled to disable six guns, which it was impossible to take from high positions over the muddy roads, but during the fighting on the southern front they captured some Japanese guns. It is reported also that they destroyed some Japanese mountain batteries.

General Kuropatkin has not yet disclosed whether he intends to make a decisive fight at Liao Yang.

General Kuropatkin seems to be well satisfied with the situation. One dispatch describes him as being in high spirits and laughing and joking at a meeting of the St. George society at Liao Yang.

The Russian losses to date are said to be about 1,500. The Russian batteries inflicted heavy losses upon the Japanese.

Information which to a very great extent confirms previous reports of the conditions at Port Arthur has arrived.

The most important statement agreed to confirms the reports that the Russians have been driven from the fort immediately east of the railroad. This fort is located in the tail of the dragoon hills, along the summit of which the eastern defenses of Port Arthur are built.

When the Russian forces retired from Fort Itseshen they entered Fort No. 15, to the north of Chaochankou. During the nights of August 18th and 19th, while it was raining, the Japanese attempted to storm Fort Atzshen, which is a strong position adjoining Itzeshen, toward the city, but they were repulsed with heavy losses. During the night of August 22d an heroic band of five hundred Japanese attempted to capture Fort No. 15, in the midst of a storm. Almost the entire detachment was killed. The Chinese declared, however, that the Russians have evacuated Fort No. 15, but whether by reason of this assault or the Japanese artillery fire can not be learned. The Japanese are unable to occupy Fort No. 15.

Twenty thousand more Japanese soldiers reinforced the beseigers at Port Artnur last week.

Following an inspection made by government engineers, the Japanese government has issued a proclamation making complete preparation to develop gold fields recently discovered in the province of Iwate. The foreigners estimate that these fields will yield gold to the value of $500,000,000, and they are now preparing to start mining operations. It is estimated that the annual yield of the mines will be $15,000,000,000.

ALABAMA'S GRETNA GREEN.

Columbus, Ga., Enjoys That Reputation—Ministers Talk.

At Columbus, Ga., a lively discussion is going on as to the propriety of issuing marriage licenses to and marrying young runaway couples, most of them elopers from Alabama. Ministers in self-defense are taking a hand in the discussion.

For many years it has been a custom for runaway couples in east Alabama to come to Columbus, this being the nearest city in the adjoining state, and the city has acquired the reputation of being the Gretna Green of Alabama couples who desired to be married under circumstances other than prosaic. Often the girls are under age. The ordinary, who says that when a young couple are a long way from home, in a strange city, with no friends or relatives who may aid and advise them, if they wish to get married the best thing to do is to marry them. The honor of the young girl often demands that the license be issued, for if it is not she would be placed in a most embarrassing position. Couples often arrive on the night trains from Alabama.

Local ministers, in explaining why they marry young couples from Alabama and other points, give practically the same reason.

On the advice of the attorney general, Acting Governor Cunningham has refused to pay a bill of $95 costs incurred by Dan Rogers, a negro, who was convicted of manslaughter and took his case to the supreme court of the United States after failing in the state supreme court, on the ground that there were no negroes on the jury. The court gave a judgment against the state of the amount mentioned and the governor was asked to pay it.

The practice of attentive and sympathetic silence might well be followed by people in general far more than it is, says Annie Payson Call, in Leslie's Monthly Magazine. The protection of a loving, unselfish silence is very great; a silence which is the result of shunning all selfish, self-assertive, vain or affected speech; a silence which is never broken for the sake of "making conversation," showing off," or covering selfish embarrassment; a silence which is full of sympathy and interest—the power of such a silence cannot be over-estimated.

It is interesting to watch the rise in life of slang and colloquial words and expressions. A very convenient phrase that has entered into the common spoken vocabulary was incorporated into an official report not so long ago by a committee of Harvard professors, which declared: "The large lecture course has come to stay." Now we find in the last number of the Speaker, a dignified library periodical of London, the rather obvious statement: "The city has come to stay." It is time for "come to stay" to be embalmed in the dictionary.

SHOULD HE COME BACK.

(Translation from Maeterlinck.)

"Should he come back this way
To seek your gate?"
"Tell him how each long day
I did but wait."

"And should he question still,
Knowing me not?"
"Pity, as sisters will,
His grievous lot."

"And if he ask your place?
How speak the thing?"
"Give him (and turn your face)
My golden ring."

"And if he quest the damp,
Dull dwelling o'er?"
"Show him the lightless lamp,
The open door."

"And if his heart ask wild
How fell your sleep?"
"Then tell him that I smiled,
Lest he should weep."

His Lost Opportunity

From the German of Josef V.

On a beautiful autumn
a bicycle trip from Paris
where I dismounted at the
I was very hungry and the clock just struck six, I at once directed my steps toward the dining room, the location of which was known to me from earlier visits.

I found the room better lighted than before, and flowers on the tables. But where were the guests? I took a seat and began to drum on the table with my knife and fork. A waiter who looked in at the door in response to the noise, and whom I asked if dinner would not be served soon replied, in a tone almost of rebuke, "Very soon, sir."

Some ladies and gentlemen came in, conversing. To my surprise, they were all in evening dress. More and more of them came, until the room was quite full, but not one of them took a seat at the tables. I sat there alone munching the roll which I found stuck in my napkin, in expectation of the soup. Nobody seemed to take any notice of me; but the waiter, who had come in again, seemed to be shocked by my conduct. I reflected that probably the new owner of the hotel had introduced new etiquette at the table d'hote. It was not long before the host came up to me and asked: "Pardon me, sir, but are you one of the wedding guests?"

"Wedding guest—I? What do you mean? Oh, is there to be a wedding dinner?"

"Yes, sir. I suppose you thought you were in the public dining room. This evening the table d'hote is served in the billiard room on account of the wedding. Prosper will show you the way."

Laughing over my mistake, I rose and followed the waiter, but before I was out of the room I heard behind me a loud "Sir, sir!"

I turned in the door. It was M Beriot, father of the bride, who was calling me. He was standing by the bride and groom, who had just come in. The young couple were smiling at me, and M. Beriot called out:

"My dear sir, you are hereby invited to keep your place at the table. Pray, do us the honor to dine with us. We have a vacant seat, for my friend Bidochard was obliged to leave before the dinner, and we shall be glad to have you take his place."

I looked at the faces around me, and saw that I should be laughed at if I refused. "I am to stay, then?" I asked, hesitatingly.

"Yes, stay, stay!" replied a chorus of voices, and all clapped their hands. A vivacious woman came forward and shook my hand, saying "How do you do, M. Bidochard?"

Under such circumstances I soon felt at home in the charming circle. I gave my card to M. Beriot, who introduced me with great ceremony. I was to sit beside his sister-in-law, a young widow, whom I had already noticed among the guests.

During the twenty or more courses I conversed diligently with my charming neighbor, and my chivalrous speeches were not received with disfavor. What she seemed to appreciate especially in me was that she could talk with me about everything. Her favorite theme, however, was music. She was vividly interested in the fact that I knew Franz Liszt personally and could tell her everything about his peculiarities and habits. She promised that if I should ever call on her when I happened to be in the city she would play a Hungarian rhapsody for me.

The next morning when I had sent for my wheel and was settling my bill a carriage drove up to the door. Soon the widow and a friend, whom I had also met the evening before, came down in traveling costume. I understood, from the way in which the friend looked at me, that I had been a subject of conversation between the two women. Returning my greeting, the lovely Mme. Beriot asked whither I was bound, and when I replied that I had no fixed destination, she suggested, blushing slightly, that I should go a little way with them on the road to Dreux, in order that they might see me on my wheel.

I assisted the two women into the carriage and accompanied them on my bicycle to Dreux. In spite of the dust which I was obliged to swallow, I felt proud and happy to play the cavalier to my lovely acquaintance. Of course, no conversation was possible on account of the rattling of the wheels. The widow talked exclusively with her friend, but often looked at me with an enchanting smile. From time to time she raised her voice to ask me if I did not wish to turn back, and when I declared that no power on earth could induce me to leave them until they had reached their destination she blushed and seemed pleased, which completely turned my head.

When we arrived at Ercux M. Berfot, of course, invited me to luncheon. Her friend was present at the meal, but left us afterward. Then, partly to start the conversation, partly because I really longed to hear her play, I reminded Mme. Beriot of her promise of the evening before. She at once declared herself ready to comply with my wish and preceded me to the drawing room. Then she took pains to insure my comfort.

I was ot sit in a large armchair, and when the coffee was brought she put it on a small table at my side. She remarked, smiling, that it was plainly written in my face how much I longed for a smoke, and brought me an expensive Havana. As she offered it to me with her beautiful, aristocratic fingers, I lost my head. I seized one of her hands and pressed a passionate kiss upon it. When I refused to let the hand go, she gave me a slight tap with the other, then, in confusion, she fled to the piano and began to play.

She played on for more than an hour—played excellently, classic and modern compositions, and perhaps her own improvisations among them. My glance rested on her; sometimes I closed my eyes in the ecstacy of listening to the music. I smoked my splendid cigar, while enchanting dreams of the future passed through my brain. Then something happened which I can never forget.

It is always my habit to lunch lightly. My new found friend, however, had set before me a rich repast, and, physically exhausted as I was, I went to sleep during a wonderfully soft pianissimo. That is the awful truth.

When I again opened my eyes her place at the piano was empty, and I was alone in the room. My only thought was flight. My cap was in the hall and my wheel was leaning against the stairs. At the speed with which I fled I could have won a race.

QUEER INDUSTRIES.

Alligator Farms, Elk Pastures, Skunk Ranches and Leech Ponds.

It was not until the buffaloes were practically extinct that it became generally known that "buffalo robes" were exceedingly warm and desirable. Whalebone has, of course, increased in price with the development of the methods of hunting. The story of ivory and elephants is much the same. Now comes a story from Florida that a number of French dealers are on the way to the Southern swamps to secure a supply of healthy young alligators for breeding purposes. It is proposed, according to a Florida authority, to establish in the south of France a farm for the propagation of the saurians. Alligator skin is made into leather that seems to strike the French aesthetic taste as the neatest for all forms of ornamental work, as well as for bags and shoes.

It is not generally known, perhaps, that a number of industries quite as queer as alligator farming have been established in this country. A Vermont man is said to make $4,500 a year raising elk, and a New York newsboy a number of years ago went West and in time had an extensive elk pasture at the foot of the Rocky Mountains. He got customers from the owners of game preserves all over the country, and found it difficult to supply the demand. The man who proposes to establish a skunk ranch in the South said of his plan: "The skunks feed upon anything so long as it is good, but they like grasshoppers better than anything else. After being killed and skinned the skunk is roasted over a slow fire for its oil. This usually sells for $5 a gallon to druggists. The black skins fetch about $1.25. A skunk will yield from one to three pints of oil. The average is about a quart." The leech farmer has no such cheerful word. It is true that leeches feed upon "anything so long as it is good," but they have decided that few things are good. In spite, therefore, of the fact that a fine, hungry leech has a good market value, there are only five farms where they are cultivated in the country.—New York Post.

A Russian Heroine.

The doughty deeds of a brave Russian girl, who on close acquaintance proves to be a Karaim Jewess, are graphically reported from Mukden. This courageous Hebrew, who is only 20, dresses as a man, calls herself Michael Smolko and has played a brilliant and helpful part as scout and dragoman. Recently, when some specially dangerous work was necessary, and qualified military men were called upon to volunteer, she was the first to offer her services and reconnoiter the Japanese position in the forest. On June 21 she headed a small party of Cossacks and not only obtained information needed by the Russian commander, but successfully drove back a large number of cattle which, having been looted by the Japanese, were being taken to their camp by Chinese auxiliaries.

At the University of Heidelberg the first woman student of theology was regularly matriculated this year.

COURTESY AT SEA.

An Impressive Experience When Ships Exchange Salutations.

The passing of two vessels within speaking distance in mid-ocean is always an impressive experience. Even the most indifferent of travelers must feel a thrill at the exchange of salutations in such circumstances. The account of such a meeting, told by a sailor on the United States training ship Hartford, and reported in the New York Tribune, is of more than ordinary interest. The Hartford, Farragut's old flagship, was ten days out from Madeira. Supper was over and the crew, 500 strong, were enjoying the leisure hour in the soft light of the full moon, when a full-rigged ship was sighted, every stitch of canvas set. She was bound to cross close in the Hartford's wake, but the thickening evening haze soon hid her from view.

Presently the watch officer cried out, "I saw a white light flash from where the ship ought to be!"

We thought it might be the glisten of the moon on her sails; but it appeared again, this time long continued and plainly visible, a signal of distress, a call for aid. Many were the conjectures as to what it could mean. Probably the crew were short of water, or someone was desperately ill and a surgeon was wanted from our steamer, or the vessel might have sprung a leak.

Without a moment's delay our captain ordered the helm to starboard. The great ship swung slowly about and bore down upon the stranger. Gradually the two vessels drew together until the lights shone clear and the outlines were well defined.

Now the order rang out, quick and distinct:

"Stand by to clear the lifeboat; make ready to lower!"

The approaching vessel was now close to our port bow, but we heard no hail.

"Try her!" ordered our captain. "Hail her with the megaphone."

"Ship ahoy! Can we be of any assistance?"

"No," came back the answer. "We did not know you were a man-of-war."

"We saw your light, and thought you signaled for help."

"No, thank you. We saw your light and bore down to assist if you needed help."

"No, thanks."

"Same to you."

"What is your nationality?"

"German."

Our ship struck up the German national anthem, while the sailors on the stranger gathered on her poop, gave us three rousing cheers, which were returned with good will by our boys, and our band played "Columbia," as the German squared on her course and passed on like a vision. But we followed her, and, running in under her stern, hailed her once more.

"We are the United States ship Hartford; what ship are you?"

"The Ariadne, of Bremen, bound home."

Our band struck up "Die Wacht am Rhein," and with three more lusty cheers from the Ariadne and three more from the 500 throats on our ship, we parted, we to the west; she, with her great gleaming spread of canvas, toward the rising moon.

She had mistaken the electric lights of our band for distress signals, and we had thought the same of her answering light. Each had gone miles out of her course to aid the other.

How the House Happened.

"Yes," said Mr. Mutt, "it was rather odd, the way I came to rebuild my house. You see, Mrs. Mutt was in town one day and happened to buy a very handsome hall lamp—one of the kind that stands on the post of the stair banisters," and then, says London Tit-Bits, he went on to describe the development of the house:

"Well, as soon as she got the lamp home, we saw that it was too large for the style of stairs, so I had to get the carpenters to come in and widen them and put in new balustrades and posts, and set them over more toward the center of the hall. When that was done the hall didn't look like a hall at all, and I had to have the carpenters tear out the walls and make the old dining room into a new hall.

"Then, of course, the kitchen had to be torn away and rebuilt at the back of the house, so that the old kitchen would do for a sitting room, and there had to be a new dining room built to match the finish in the hall. And when things got so far we saw at once that we had to have a library off the hall, and then the veranda had to go to make room for the library, and my pet rose bushes came up to give a chance to build the new veranda.

"Well, to make a long story short, I had to remodel the second story to match the first, and put a third story on in order to take care of the rooms that were crowded out by the changes in the second. And so I had a new house all round."

"And was your wife pleased?"

"Only partly. You see, just on the last day when the carpenters had completed the third story and were finishing work on the whole job, one of them dropped his hammer through the skylight and it fell to the hall and smashed the lamp that had started the whole thing."

Both at Bonn and at Breslau new colleges for girls has been opened, offering a six-year course after graduation from the high school.

TO AIR THE CELLAR.

When cellars become musty or foul and odors are noticed the best thing to do is to close all the doors and windows and burn enough sulphur to fill the cellar room with dense fumes. Leave it closed for an hour or two, and then open the doors and windows. Next whitewash the walls and ceilings with two coats of good whitewash. Sulphur gas is heavy and settles, hence care must be used to agitate the air in the cellar by selecting a windy day for the work. Sulphur fumes will destroy all kinds of germs.

SOME HELPFUL HINTS.

Much labor may be saved in washing frying pans if they are wiped out clean with a piece of paper after the fat is poured from them, before they are put in the dish water. The paper should then be burned. These pans should also have a perioric boiling in soda water in a large kettle. If these two things are done they will be kept as smooth inside as when new.

To Remove Scorch Marks—Bake an onion, then squeeze out the juice and mix it with an ounce of fuller's earth, a glassful of vinegar and a small quantity of shredded soap. Heat together till the soap has melted, leave till cold, and then apply to the scorched linen. Let it dry on and then wash in the usual way.

Scented Handkerchiefs—To give handkerchiefs a faint scent of violets, hold them in water to which a little piece of orris root has been added.

FOR THE HOUSEKEEPER.

One of the handy things to have about the house is an emergency bag. This is really a collection of pockets, or wall bag, tacked on the wall in some convenient place, or on the inside of a closet door. In one of the pockets put all the old, soft, worn linens; another may contain ordinary cotton batting; another, coarser cloths and bandages; in another may be a roll of absorbent cotton, and so on, with a pocket for buttons, darning cotton, patches or other articles that are constantly being called for. Bits of cord, string from the grocer's packages, a rolled quantity of strips, a paper of sticking plaster and many other things will find a corner there, and will save many a weary hunt, in case of accident, or other need.

A knife rack is a thoroughly useful thing to have in the kitchen. Take a board about four inches wide and twenty inches long, held by two brackets of wood or iron. Drill holes with a gimlet along both sides of the board about an inch apart, and place in pairs. The wood between each pair of holes is cut away with a keyhole saw, and the edges of the slots thus formed are smoothed with sandpaper. Then fasten the board on its brackets. The slots are to hold the blades of the knives, and support the handle. A companion piece to this is a spoonbar. This is made of a strip of wood a foot long and two or three inches wide. This may be fastened to the wall with screws, or hung upon hooks with eyes, or fastened to brackets. At suitable distances along the strip, put in small hooks, and on these hang spoons, cook forks, ladles, etc. Do not hang two things on one hook. If one board is likely to be crowded, make another.

One of the nicest materials for dish cloths, is a cheap grade of cheese cloth—two or three cents a yard, in the department stores; it does the work well, and does not hold the grease or gather the scum from the dishwater, and can be easily washed clean and dried in the sun. It is cheap enough to admit of burning when it shows too much sign of usage. The cloth when new does not dry well but serves for a wash cloth admirably. It is also serviceable for the toilet and the bath.

RECIPES.

Minced Meat on Toast—Prepare the toast, arrange on a hot platter and keep hot; remove gristle, fat., etc., from cold, cooked meat; chop the meat very fine, measure it and put it into a saucepan; add one-half cup of gravy for each cup of meat; season to taste with salt, pepper and, if liked, with fine chopped or grated onion, or a few drops of onion juice, or a little peppery sauce; grated nutmeg may be added to lamb or mutton if liked; place saucepan over the heat and stir until meat is heated; pour over hot toast and serve at once; the toast may be buttered or not, as preferred.

Broiled Tomatoes—This is especially easy to do over a gas fire, but can be done over coals. Select fresh, firm tomatoes, wash, dry and cut into thick slices, leaving the skin on to hold them together. Heat and grease the broiler, lay on the sliced tomatoes, salted and peppered, and broil quickly. Season with a little butter and serve while hot. A variation is afforded by sprinkling with cheese while broiling.

Chocolate Sandwiches.—Moisten unsweetened, grated chocolate with sweet cream; sprinkle with powdered sugar, and fill in bread cut round.

Chocolate Wafers—Two-thirds cup butter, one cup powdered sugar, one-half teaspoon salt, one-half teaspoon cinnamon, two ounces grated chocolate, melted; one teaspoon baking powder, two tablespoons milk, two and one-half cups flour; roll out thin, using as little flour as possible, and bake in a hot oven.

First Baby—What are your parents like?

Second Baby—Oh, they do pretty well for amateurs?

A SERMON FOR SUNDAY

AN ELOQUENT DISCOURSE ENTITLED, "REWARDS OF RIGHTEOUSNESS."

The Rev. Dr. N. McGee Waters Says That if You Would Attain Earthly Prosperity Christ Must Be Your Teacher—The True Prescription For All Scholarship.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—Dr. N. McGee Waters, pastor of the Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church, took as his subject Sunday morning, "Rewards of Righteousness." His text was from Matthew vi: 33: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Dr. Waters said in the course of his excellent sermon:

From the beginning until now man's search has been for the golden age. Sometimes he named it the Golden Fleece; sometimes Holy Grail. Plato prophesied it in a republic yet to be. Bunyan, after a weary pilgrimage, found it beyond the Delectable Mountains. Bacon saw it in Atlantis, rising out of the midst of an unsailed sea. It is always afar off and in the future. Like the pot of gold at the foot of the rainbow, it is always over the next hill.

Jesus also prophesied a golden age—called it "the Kingdom of God," and found it in the present time. For a long time men went hungry, and lo! there was always plenty in the ground—when they "scratched the earth with a hoe it laughed with a harvest." They prized diamonds, and lo! they were always in the river beds for the finding. They shivered for warmth, and lo! coal was stored under the hills. They longed for some pack horse, and lo! giants were chained in every flowing river. They were always looking for the golden age. Jesus said: "Look within—the Kingdom of God is within you."

Men are always expecting the Kingdom of God to come through some device of their making. They cry, "Let us have a better government and a better wage, and we will have the Kingdom of God; let us toil and hoard a mountain of gold, and when our barns are filled we will have the Kingdom of God. Let us search after knowledge, and when we are wise we will have the Kingdom of God. Let us trade our strength for popularity and reputation, when with the laurel we have bound our brow we shall be blessed."

Jesus says just the opposite: "Seek the Kingdom of God and you will have no labor problem, for you will have an increased wage; seek the Kingdom of God, and you will find wealth; seek the Kingdom of God, and you will be enrolled among the children of immortality." Men say, "Let us get rich and we will be content." Jesus says, "Be content, and you will be rich." Men say, "Let us get wisdom, and we will be happy." Jesus says, "Be happy and you will be wise. Men say, "If we can gain all these things, like houses and lands, we will be the children of the Kingdom of God." Jesus says, "Enter into the Kingdom of God, and you will have all these things."

When will we believe the teachings of Jesus? He was ahead of His time. We are growing up to Him, to understand Him better than early generations. Every saying of His we find true as law and fact. Take that saying of His, "The meek shall inherit the earth." It was too hard for His age. But time, the great tester, pronounces it pure gold. The wise man everywhere sees the exceeding reward of meekness. They get who forget.

Jesus said to His disciples: "It is expedient for you that I go away." They could not believe that then. But when a long time hath passed we know that really death is a benefit, and that great men are never so valuable to their disciples as after they have gone away from the earth. The text, "Seek first the Kingdom of God," etc., is one of those sayings that we have to grow up to. Generally men have read it in some mystical way. They have regarded it as true only in some peculiar religious sense. But it is a literal fact; it is truth; it is law of the universe. Virtue is the road to fame. Godliness is profitable in this world.

"And all these things shall be added." What things? Christ has just named them—food and clothes and the material prizes for which men strive. Men are swayed by motives as trees are by the winds. Tell me what you most love and I will tell you what you will be. You love knowledge with a passion—the Greek did and he became a scholar; you love power—the Roman did and Rome is yet law giver for the nations; you love beauty—John Keats did and he became a poet. Among the motives that sway men's daily lives, we may put first these three—the pursuit of wealth, the gaining of knowledge and the winning of fame. How can these things best be won? According to Jesus, by a deep hearted search after the Kingdom of God.

Wealth—the laws of wealth are the laws of righteousness. Knowledge—the kingdom of knowledge is the Kingdom of God. Fame—"the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous, but the ways of the wicked shall rot."

Let us look at the world of wealth. The savage has no prosperity; it is only the civilized man who grows rich. What is wealth? Emerson tells us it begins "with a tight roof that keeps out the rain and a good pump that yields sweet waters, and horses, or a locomotive to cross the land, and a boat to cross the sea." But whence come the roof and the pump and the ship and the locomotive? Man did not invent them; he only discovered them. They are the laws of God dressed up in clothes of wood and steel and stone. The laws of wealth are the laws of righteousness. Men go toward prosperity as they find the laws of God.

Again, how do we get wealth? There are three possible ways. A man may beg it, he may steal it, or a man may earn it. But neither pauper nor beggar increases the wealth of the community. Only by the laws of industry and vision can we increase wealth. But the laws of labor and vision are the laws of the Kingdom of God. Barbarism has been, with its poverty, defined as "society without the commandments." Contrariwise, then, civilization, with all its houses and lands and stocks and bonds, is society with the commandments. Violation of the laws of God in every age means bankruptcy. Obedience to the laws of God in every age makes for prosperity. History writes down the tale of empires. When she writes down "Pyramids" and "Parthenon" and "Hanging Gardens," she expresses their desolation by saying over their ruins, "These people forgot God, and hence their waste places." She writes down "London," "Chamber of Commerce," "Shipyards," "Temple," "Library," and expresses their glory by saying, "These have remembered God—hence their prosperity."

The Bible pronounces "Anathema" against those who "make haste to get rich"—that is, they who, despising the laws of God, take a short cut to prosperity. Their wealth is poverty; their gain is loss. The mistress who holds back the just wage from the maid; the borrower who refuses to return to the lender; the government that debases its people with debased coin, may temporarily gain; but such wealth destroys the possessor and is like the wrecker's handful of coin, gleaned from the beach to which he has beguiled an argosy; is like the camp follower's bundle of rags stolen from the breast of men slain in battle; it like the coin of Judas—only blood money paid to buy a potter's field wherein liberty and justice and prosperity shall at last be buried in the grave of dishonor. Way back in the Old Testament we have Moses saying: "Thou shalt not have diverse measures in thy sanctuary." The words call up for us a scene from that far off time. There are booths with baskets of figs and grapes and golden wheat and bottles of oil and [illegible] cloths, and the merchant has two sets of scales—one scale, with a large [illegible] which he buys the grapes [illegible] handman, and another, with a [illegible] in which he sells the grapes [illegible] wife. And the King by [illegible] men in debased coin, and [illegible] tegrity and justice are [illegible] ed, and there is growing [illegible] lying King and lying merchants and [illegible] words. The old prophet rises in his [illegible] and says: "A false measure is an abomination unto the Lord." And [illegible] commerce at last poisons [illegible] dation of civilization [illegible] nation and the individual [illegible] forgotten God and His [illegible] for a long time in the [illegible]

The laws of wealth [illegible] righteousness. If you would [illegible] if you would attain it [illegible] multiply houses and [illegible] you would make a [illegible] the rose, let Christ [illegible] first the kingdom of God [illegible] all these things shall [illegible]

What is knowledge? [illegible] knowledge? There [illegible] the lonesomest man in [illegible] of the poorest, feeding [illegible] on French revolution, [illegible] ages. When he speaks [illegible] greatest prophet and [illegible] message is: "I have [illegible] among all peoples." He [illegible] us the laws of divine [illegible] run through the nature [illegible] Scandanavian Eden [illegible] the liquid fire of the [illegible] skull of perished emperors [illegible] his Puritan lips as they [illegible] wine. Knowledge is finding out [illegible] laws. There is Charles Dickens [illegible] not satisfied to meet people [illegible] as we do and shake hands with [illegible] learn their names. But [illegible] hearts and homes and hopes [illegible] with sympathy, with pathos and [illegible] est humor, he writes his [illegible] books become a sort of Bible [illegible] merged tenth of society, and [illegible] find written down the great divine [illegible] which govern action and conduct and [illegible] acter. He is the poor man's preacher [illegible] cause he found on the heart of [illegible] man the handwriting of God. All knowledge is revelation.

Seeking the way God made the stars, Kepler became an astronomer. Seeking the way the world was made, Watt became a scientist. Seeking the mysteries and secrets of the human soul and God's will therein; Kant became a philosopher. Seeking to find out how God wrought in human nature, Shakespeare penetrated the soul depths of Iago, Hamlet, Desdemona, Richard, Henry and Lear in transcribing into words what he has written there, he has given us his dramas. Lo! the dramas of Shakespeare are almost another book of God in which we find written the divine law of retribution and forgiveness and sacrifice and redemption. Augustine comes and his word is law, but it is the law of inspiration. Browning comes and his one word is inspiration, but it is the inspiration of love. And Beecher and Phillips Brooks come and their one word is love, but it is the love of God. Save he bring us a word of love the wisdom of the scholar is foolishness.

Have you ever seen the shimmering of a lake when the sun was playing on its surface? Have you seen the gleams of golden light dancing like angels on the waters? You know the glory was in the sun and not in the water. The sun was the source, but the waters were clothed in a borrowed glory. If you have ever stood in a great valley surrounded by mountains, and heard the echoes repeated from mount to mount, some loud, some soft, some distant, some near at hand, you know the voice was not in the mountains. The mountains only carried the voice. So great scholars are only waters and mountain peaks. The voice is God Almighty who speaks. It is the light that shines. There is a difference in men. The difference between great men and little men always consist in this—the great man is always listening for the voice of God. The little man is taken up with the sound of his earthly on-going. The one heard a sound and said: "It thunders." The other heard a sound and said: "It thunders." Jesus standing with them knew "it was an angel that had spoken unto Him." Knowledge is revelation. There is no other way. If you would be a scholar, if you would wear a scholar's crown and have a scholar's power, you must seek and know God, you must seek and know Him as He is to face and to find out His ways, which are above our ways, and His words, which are above our words. Here is the prescription for all scholarship: "Seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

In every age men believe that fame can be bought for a price, and so they build up their warehouses and build up their fleets. So they multiply their fleets until their white sails cover every sea; so they gather to themselves houses and lands and stocks and bonds. When they die the market drops down for a day or a week and then the world goes on. You do not know the names of any rich men in Athens or Rome or Thebes or Babylon. You may know the name of some orator or some scholar who had wealth, but you do do not know the name of any man who had nothing but wealth. There was a man who laid the foundation of his fortune in the days of the Stuarts. He was a powder manufacturer. He drove his coach and four and lived in a palace. He built silken stairs for his children. He had been an ardent Royalist, but when the Revolution came he said: "There is a tide in the affairs of men, which, if taken in its flood, leads on to fortune." And he cut off his powdered curls and left off his jeweled sword, and even sang psalms. He turned Puritan and turned his back on the cathedral and went to worship in a Puritan conventicle. He had his reward. He got the contract for making powder for Cromwell's army and became a multi-millionaire. And when the restoration came he grew again his Dyke board, he again wore his velvet coat, let, he again went to church with book and crucifix. He even stood on the balcony and applauded when Cromwell's bones were hung up to dry on Tyburn Hill. He finally became a cavalier and he had his reward. For lo! Charles made him a Knight of the Garter and he still had the contract for making powder for the English army. What was his name? You do not know. Nobody knows. You cannot find his name written down in any book. But in that same time there was a poor man who was a Puritan under the first Stuarts, who was Puritan secretary of commonwealth under Cromwell, and who was a poor, blind and poor, an exile threatened with his life under the returned Stuarts, who had the pen of a ready writer and the arts offered him gold to make the worse appear the better side. He said: "Nay, nay, I will live in hunger and I will die, my children cry for bread, but I will not sell my honor. I care not for parties, I strive only for the truth of the Kingdom of God." And everything he ever wrote in prose or in poetry is still remembered. His name was John Milton, and every English boy knows it by heart. Seek first the Kingdom of God and fame will find you out. Always the pathway to greatness is along the line of loyalty to the Kingdom of God.

Seek the Kingdom of God, that is the great thing. Any man who seeks wealth for wealth's sake will always be poor, though he be clad in purple. Any man who seeks first and always the Kingdom of God will be rich, whether he live in a garret or a king's palace. It is the law of the universe. They who love truth and serve her, receive a true man's reward. houses and lands in the present time and in the time to come, life eternal. Closing an old poem a little:

Then to side with truth is noble,
Though we share her wretched crust,
For her cause brings fame and profit,
And 'tis prosperous to be just.

The Unforgotten Song

The years have taught me many things,
But none so sure as this:
That shelter, solace, joy and strength
Are always where God is.

So now, when hope and courage fail,
And only fear is strong,
My heart will sing, as in the past,
An unforgotten song.
God is my refuge and my strength,
I will not be afraid;
And though the night be wild and dark,
I meet it undismayed.

Then, to begin at the beginnin'," the landlord, clearing, reluctant- ntly, for action by depositing with his knife stuck up- it, on the porch railing, "it account of an ord'nance here providin' that there any parades unless the may- a permit for it. Last year the circus struck town we had a grained, crabbed old feller for an' when the circus man went a permit for his parade he got down.

'I want a permit to parade,' says circus man.

'You can't have it,' says the mayor.

'I'd like to know why I can't,' says circus man.

'Cause circuses are demoralizin' indecent inventions of the devil for lead the young an' unwary onter de- struction, an' consequently I don't ap- of them,' says the mayor.

So the two of them had it back an' forth an' heavy. The circus man an' the mayor refusin': the man threatenin', an' the mayor him: the circus man pleadin', mayor sittin' obstinate; the man gettin' madder an' madder, mayor not budgin' an inch; the cussin', and the mayor seventy-five cents per cuss the upshot of it all was that man had to leave without but swearin' he'd parade in all the mayors an' permits in while the mayor was vowin'

Well, mister circus man came down here an' carried on somethin' awful, worse than the wildest man from Borneo you ever seen, an' offerin' everythin' to everybody if they'd only tell him how he could outwit the mayor, an' jest then I had sorte an idear. So I says to him, 'Say,' I says, 'Mose Johnson's lyin' dead this minit, waitin' for the poor board to bury him, Mose always bein' a shiftless, thoughtless, no-'count kind of a feller.'

"'I wish it was the mayor,' snaps Mr. Circus. 'What of it?'

"'Well,' I says, 'I dunno as there's any ord'nance regulatin' funerals, or permit got to be got for the same. Do I get that contract for feedin' the animals?' I says.

"'You do' says the circus man, his face lighting up like a transparency. 'Set 'em up for the house, an' then come and show me where Johnson's abode is.'

"At first the disconsolate widder stood out for a full suit of mournin'—dress, shoes, stockin's, bonnet, veil, an' all the fixin's—but finally she compromised on a crape veil an' a pass to the show an' a seat on the band-wagon.

"Accordin', right on the time advertised, along down the street past the mayor's office came a hearse, with Johnson reposin' peacefully in it, an' the circus follerin' in all its glory, with crowlin' an' carryin' on, each in his the red an' gold glitterin', an' the elephants trumpetin', an' the lions roarin', an' the hyenas laughin', an' the rest of the menagerie howlin' an' gruntin' an' particular style, an' the band playin' sometimes a funeral march to jig time an' sometimes 'A Hot Time in the Old Town' to funeral march time, an' the horses prancin', an' the ladies smirkin', an' the chariots rumblin', an' the clowns grinnin', an' the men smilin', an' the steam planner tootlin' hymn tunes with variations, an' the circus man a-straddlin' a dancin' piebald stallion, lookin' proud an' serene an' happy.

"My socks, wasn't it the mayor's turn to be mad! He came rushin' out of his office like a crazy man on the loose, an' catchin' hold of the bridles of the horses pullin' the hearse, shoved them right spang back on their haunches.

"'What's the meanin' of this here?' shouted the circus man, ridin' up, pretendin' to be terribly shocked. 'What do you mean by interferin' in this outrageous way with my old friend Mr. Johnson's funeral, you old grave-robber you?'

"'Wha-at?' gasps the mayor.

"'I'll have you know that we're performin' our sad duty of attendin' our late lamented friend's remain to their last restin' place, you irreverent old body snatcher. Ain't we, Mrs. Johnson?' says the circus man, pleasant as a basket of chips.

"'Yes, you be,' chirps the forlorn widder, from where she was munchin' peanuts an' popcorn besides the bass-drum in the band-wagon.

"Well, sir, the mayor was pig-headed about some things, but he realized instanter that he didn't have no authority to stop a funeral in full career. So all he could do was grind his teeth, an' froth considerable at the mouth, an' hope somethin'd turn up that'd give him a chance at that circus man while that parade followed Johnson all over town. An' they didn't shirk Johnson none, either, but finally went ahead an' planted him to the tune of 'Where Was Moses When the Light Went Out?' There was the biggest crowd at that funeral that ever attended such a melancholy event in this town.

"An' that's why," concluded the landlord, resuming his knife and turnip, "we're claimin' that the last sad rites paid to Mose Johnson's ashes were somethin' new an' unique in the way of obsequies, at least in this here neighborhood."

DOOM OF GREAT SALT LAKE.

Scientists Say It Will Dry Up Within Half a Century.

Statistics indicate that Great Salt lake, the Dead sea of America, is doomed—that it is gradually drying up. The opinion now almost universally prevails among scientists that this mysterious body of water, located at an altitude of 4,210 feet above the sea level and 1,000 miles inland, and which has but a single rival, the Dead sea of Palestine, is certain within the course of a half century to disappear from the map. Some scientists, who have made a careful study of the fluctuations of the lake for the past several years, even declare that it will be dried up within a quarter of a century.

Sixteen years ago, in 1886, the area of the lake's surface was estimated at about 2,700 square miles. Taking twenty feet as the average depth at that time, one may estimate 1,505,433,600,000 cubic feet as the contents of the lake. To-day, according to recent surveys, the lake has an area of about 2,125 square miles. Multiplying this number by 11½, the number of feet in depth of the water that has disappeared and not been replaced, gives 669,778,400,000 cubic feet as the quantity of water less than what the lake had sixteen years ago.

Observers of the lake have assigned three causes for the shrinkage of its water. They are evaporation, irrigation and a subterranean outlet that some suppose to exist. There are ardent advocates of each of these theories.

He Was in a Hurry.

We were waiting for a train at a station in the country. The station agent combined the offices of trainmaster, express agent, telegraph operator and the rest. He looked wise when you asked him a question, but he wasn't.

"Does the next train carry a dining car?" we asked.

"Wal," he said, looking for a wide crack in the platform before he emptied an overload of tobacco juice from between his teeth. "I can't jes' rightly say. I ain't never tuk much inter-rest in them cyars."

"Does it stop at Swamptown?" was the next question. The agent was clearly uncertain on this point.

"Well, when is it due?" we asked, anxious to learn if he was certain of anything about the train.

"Wal, hits due at haf-pas' 3 or haf-pas' fo', I furgit which," he replied. "I kinder open up 'bout an hour after dinner and set aroun' till dark. Hit don't make much difference to me when she comes."

"Good Lord, man, don't you know anything about the trains through your own station?" we asked in desperation.

"Wal, now," he said, and it was easy to see that his feelings were wounded; "yer might give er feller er chanst to larn. I ain't had this job but three weeks."—Nashville Banner.

Made Temporary Truce.

James VI of Scotland—afterward James I. of England—in 1587, being much perturbed by the constant quarrels among his nobles, determined to end all disputes by a summary process of reconciliation. Accordingly, having assembled the nobles on Sunday, May 14, at Holyrood, in the lodging of Sir James Maitland of Thirlstane, he drank to them and caused them all to shake hands. On the following day, after banqueting them in Holyrood, he caused the earls of Angus, Montrose, Mar and Glencairn, also the master of Glammis, and many others—all deadly enemies to one another—to march hand in hand two abreast from the abbey to Holyrood along the Canongate and High street of Edinburgh to the town cross, where the provost and bailies had a table spread with wines and sweetmeats. Here the company once more drank to their eternal amity and separated. But a few weeks later they were lying in wait, as of old, to kill one another.

Eternal.

Since the star Sirius crossed the Milky Way—
'Tis but a single point in space and time—
The sixty thousand years but yesterday
That seems to us so vast and so sublime.

There is no measure for the infinite.
The Past, the Now, the Future are as one;
Through sixty million of our years the Light
Has flown through space from that great central sun.

There never was a time there was no light,
Or when Creation's work was first begun;
No time when Thought, the act of Mind, in flight,
Did not outstrip the swiftest light of sun.

Don't Carry Cigars.

I desire to suggest to cigar smokers:

Don't, at this time of the year, or, in fact, at any time, carry one or several cigars in the left or right upper waistcoat pocket. The body is a rare absorbent, and, especially in summer, with wide open pores, if tobacco is in close contact, there is likely to be an absorption of its principles which will result in vertigo, faintness and perhaps worse.

Enjoying the best of health, I could not account for some very peculiar sensations at times which gave me the utmost alarm. Even in bed I would experience something approaching a sinking spell. I traced the cause to my habit of carrying cigars in my waistcoat pockets.—New York Times.

WHAT THE BOY WANTED.

Odd Question Put to Chief Justice Shaw by an Audacious Boy.

Chief Justice Shaw, though very rough in his manner, was exceedingly considerate of the rights of poor and friendless persons. Sometimes persons unacquainted with the ways of the world would desire to make their own arguments or would in some way interrupt the business of the court. The chief justice commonly treated them with great consideration.

One amusing incident happened quite late in his life.

A rather dissipated lawyer who had a case approaching on the docket one day told his office boy to "go over to the supreme court and see what in hell they are doing." The court were hearing a very important case in which Mr. Choate was on one side and Mr. Curtis on the other. The bar and the courtroom were crowded with listeners. As Mr. Curtis was in the midst of his argument the eye of the chief justice caught sight of the young urchin, 10 or 11 years old, with yellow trousers stuffed in his boots and with his cap on one side of his head, gazing intently up at him.

He said: "Stop a moment, Mr. Curtis."

Mr. Curtis stopped and there was a profound silence as the audience saw the audacious little fellow standing entirely unconcerned.

"What do you want, my boy?" said the chief justice.

"Mr. P. told me to come over here and see what in hell you was up to," was the reply.

There was a dive at the unhappy youth by three or four of the deputies in attendance and a roar of laughter from the audience. The boy was ejected. But the gravity of the old chief justice was not disturbed.—Senator Hoar's autobiography.

BEATS A CONFIDENCE MAN.

Cook on Atlantic Liner Neatly Foils Alleged American Millionaire.

The classical confidence trick has been neatly played on a would-be swindler in Paris by his intended victim. The latter, a cook on a trans-Atlantic liner, had been done himself before and was too old a bird to be caught again. He struck up an acquaintance with an engaging but obviously sham American millionaire in the train to Paris, confiding to him that he had 40,000 francs in his bag and meant to amuse himself on the boulevards. "Well met, indeed," said the millionaire; "I have also made my pile and intend seeing the merry side of life in gay Paree."

They started the evening with an expensive dinner, paid for by the American millionaire. At coffee the latter exclaimed: "Hullo, I have not any cigars; suppose you go and buy some. You can leave your bag here, where it will be quite safe. But, as you might be suspicious here's my pocketbook. Keep it till you join me again."

As soon as the cook's back was turned the American millionaire, of course, bolted with the bag, but the latter only contained old newspapers and the cook's card, with the words: "I have been had before; you have met your match this time." In the would-be swindler's pocketbook was a sum of £24 in French notes, which the cook took to the police station, asking the officer to whom he told his tale with understandable relish to give the money to the poor.

Men as Projectiles.

A Singhalese newspaper published in Colombo, Ceylon, is tired of the paucity of news about the war, and in order to regale its readers it now and then manufactures some, of which the following is a sample—a translation by the Ceylon Times:

"The sultan was communicated with regarding an approaching conflict, and, being a great friend of the Japanese monarch, he sent a specially trained company of swordsmen, each of whom with a sword in his hand is shot away from the mouth of a gun at the enemy just as ordinary shrapnel would be. On arrival among the enemy he makes short work of them by his sword play. These swordsmen are now fighting for Japan and gaining victories."

Small wonder that Kin-chow and Nan-Shan fell!—New York Commercial.

In Old Virginia.

I love the mountains wreathed in mist,
The twilight skies of amethyst,
The groves of ancient oaks, sun-kissed,
In old Virginia.

I love the gorgeous trumpet flowers,
Wild rose and honeysuckle bowers,
The woodland incense after showers,
In old Virginia.

I love the laughter of the rills;
Cloud shadows stretched athwart the hills,
The jocund song of him who tills,
In old Virginia.

I love the martial ranks of corn,
Their blades agleam with lights of morn,
The curtains of the night withdrawn,
In old Virginia.

I love the modest maidenhood,
The deference paid to womanhood,
The chivalric and gentleblood,
In old Virginia.

I love the love of native sod,
The simple faith that trusts in God,
The heads bowed 'neath the chastening rod,
In old Virginia.

Pen Portrait of Andrew Lang.

In a new volume by a woman artist of London appears this description of Andrew Lang: "He struck me as being rather superciliously despondent; perhaps he feels that he has not done justice to himself; also deep down in him is evidently the belief that mankind is divided into two categories—those who have been to Oxford and those who have not. He is very handsome, indeed striking, with his dark eyes and snowy hair. Mr. Lang looks languidly sorry for nine-tenths of the human race."

Must Be Well Shod

All military men are agreed that the feet of soldiers must be in good condition in order that they can fulfill their duties efficiently. No troops the feet of whose members generally are not sound are able to carry on a long campaign successfully. Napoleon, Wellington and many other celebrated generals have insisted upon the necessity of soldiers being suitably shod. Indeed, good food and good feet are two most essential points in determining the issue of a war.

The Japanese, according to all reports, is in almost every respect an ideal soldier. He is brainy, enduring, strong, and, moreover, is able to thrive on a diet which would mean almost starvation to fanaticism, and, as is well known, fanatics have ever been most redoubtable fighters. But he has a weakness, and, in the opinion of Dr. Martignon, late resident physician to the French embassy in Pekin, a fatal weakness—his feet are defective. His body is of iron, but his feet are of clay.

The British Medical Journal, May 14, referring to this matter, gives an apropos quotation from Rudyard Kipling. That writer, in "My Lord the Elephant," put into the mouth of one of his characters, Mulvaney, the witty Irishman, these words, "I had a boot gall, but I was all for keepin' up wid the rig'ment and such like foolishness, so I finished up wid a hole in my heel that you cud ha' dhrew a tent-peg into. Faith, how often have I preached that to recruits since, for a warning to them to look after their feet. Our dochtor, who knew our business as well as his own, he sez to me—in the middle of the Tangi Pass it was—'That's sheer damned carelessness,' sez he; 'how often have I told you that a marchin' man is no stronger than his feet—his feet—his feet!' sez he."

The feet of the Japanese are not naturally weaker or worse than the feet of other Orientals—probably better—but the authorities, in their zeal to copy accurately the equipment of European infantry, have shod their soldiers in thick heavy boots, and have in this respect overshot the mark. The Japanese have been accustomed for generations to wear sandals, paper shoes, or those made of a soft material, or to go barefooted. Thus to put persons not used to having their feet restrained into heavy leath boots was an experiment not alt er in accord with the high in t displayed by the Japanese in all other matters relat- —Medical Record.

Schooldays and Blue Eyes

Ah, little old red schoolhouse on the hill!
In freckled days, in cowlick days of yore
My heart it used to bump and jump and thrill
When I was called to mount the platform floor.
A little maiden used to pose sedate,
Her seat it was the first one front, you know,
Her eyes they dazed me while I ranted great
About Demosthenes or Cicero.

She used to wear a pretty tucker gown,
'Twas trimmed with pink about her dainty neck,
Her golden hair in pigtails hanging down.
Ah, me, that vision sent my heart awreck!
But, heavens! how I used to tremble then,
The while her eyes they bored me through and through!
I used to march a hundred thousand men
In quavering before those eyes of blue.

And when my mighty effort had been made
And I went marching back unto my seat,
To my dismay I saw her eyes they strayed
Down to the region of my clutt'ring feet.
There, from the vantage of my royal throne,
I'd note how very nicely and precise
The pretty golden pigtails they had grown,
For I was brave—behind my paradise.

Ah, me! There came a day of parting there,
The schooldays they are ended and the time
Of life it bore a somber sounding air—
Long years ago one afternoon in June—
And I was standing in the same old spot,
With eyes fixed on a pretty maiden trim,
Each pulse within my being throbbing hot,
While I declaimed with more than wonted vim.

Ah, me! The sweetness of the schoolhouse bell!
My eyes they hear your calling notes again.
Anon I'm trooping at your beck and spell
With kindred spirits down the shady lane.
The clover flower's spilling on the air
The essence of its sweetness and perfume,
And by my side a maiden wanders there
Along the fields of sunshine and of bloom.

Fond memory recalls the winding ways,
The daisy cham, the sunny brook that flows,
Each throb and thrill of childish roundelays,
The grapevine swing, the briar path, the rose.
Ah! sweeter to my heart than all the rest
Of life's delightful pleasures of the old
Was one who laid her head upon my breast
And whispered—what? I never yet have told.

Antitoxin for Hay Fever

The real cause of hay fever, that disagreeable and puzzling form of summer affliction, is claimed to have been discovered by the bureau of plant industry of the department of agriculture. To be more correct, the discovery was not made by this bureau, but its experts have confirmed a theory as to the cause of this disease put forward by a German investigator. Some time ago word was received here that a German scientist named Dunbar had found a hay fever toxin and as he declared that the disease was occasioned by the pollen of grasses the matter naturally fell under the supervision of the bureau of plant industry. The officials of that bureau proceeded to follow up Dunbar's theory with the intention of publishing the curative formula. The investigations of the bureau were conducted in connection with a New York hospital.

It was found that hay fever is brought on by a species of blood poisoning. A substance contained in the pollen of grasses is thrown off during the summer months and, being inhaled, is deposited on the mucous membrane of the nose. It then dissolves and is absorbed in the blood. The offending particles do not come from roses, sneeze weeds or golden rod, as is generally supposed. They escape from various kinds of flowering grasses. It was found that by injecting this toxic material into the blood of a healthy person it would bring on a well-developed case of hay fever. By injecting the same material into the blood of a goat or horse the experts obtained an antitoxin after the fashion that other antitoxins are secured.

Just as the officials of the bureau of plant industry had about established the accuracy of the claims of the German scientists and was preparing to make the process public word was received that Dunbar had patented his process. Consequently the matter was dropped by the government.—Washington Letter in Brooklyn Eagle.

Victim of Book Agent

Senator W. A. Clark detests nothing more than to be interrupted when busy. One day he was in his office engaged in a business conversation when a petite woman carrying a black bag entered. With a compelling smile and an insinuating manner she approached the surly millionaire. Utterly insensible to his repellent mood and indifferent to his abrupt manner, she drew from the depths of the bag a handsomely bound volume, the merits and beauties of which she began to eloquently descant upon.

Failing to embarrass her with arctic rigidity and impatient at her persistence under rebuffs all but vulgar he turned suddenly upon the chattering woman and asked:

"Madame, do you know what my time is worth?"

She confessed it was a conundrum.

"Well," he said, petulantly, "it's worth $30 an hour!"

He turned away with the air of one who had settled the matter definitely beyond any further controversy. But he didn't know the woman.

"Oh, I'm so grateful to you, Mr. Clark," she replied with a tone of pathos in her voice. "Thirty dollars an hour, did you say?"

"Yes; that's what I said, and it's cheap at that," and he smiled cynically.

"Oh, I know it is dirt cheap," she chirruped with winsome blitheness. "I am so glad you told me—" rummaging in her reticule, from which she quickly fished out a purse gorged with currency. Moving near to the astonished millionaire, who now regarded her movements with unfeigned curiosity, she counted two bills, a ten and a five, off the roll. These she pushed along the top of the sloping desk toward him and said: "Yes, I'm glad you told me, because I hadn't expected to get it so cheap. There is $15. Now, I want a half hour of your uninterrupted attention while I talk to you about this book."

Clark pushed back the money and subscribed and paid for two copies of the book.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Whistler Always an Artist.

Mortimer Menpes, long a close associate of Whistler, thus describes that famous artist: "In appearance Whistler was slight, small-boned and extremely dainty. He seemed always to have a sparkling air about him. His complexion was very bright and fresh; his eyes were keen and brilliant and his hair, when I knew him, was, save for one snowy lock, of a glossy raven black. His dress was quaint and a little different from that of other men and his whole appearance, even his deportment, was studied from the artistic standpoint."

COTTON PRICES LAST SEASON.

The following figures for the cotton market at Clanton, for the season of 1903-4, may help our farmers to see where it will benefit them to hold their cotton, either at home or in the Clanton ware-house. Notice that the price sank when you all tried to rush your crops in at once, but when the receipts began to taper off the price went up.

The total receipts September, 10 1903, to March 17, 1904, were 6,648 bales, the price on September 10, was 11 1-4 cents, thence down to 8 3-4 on Oct. 3, thence up (with one or two slight reactions) to 15 3-8 on March 17, 1904, making an average price for the season of 12 cents. The first 3,000 bales were sold at an average of 9 cents, the second 3,000 bales at an average of 10.70. In short the producer got 3 cents less than the average price of 12 cents for the first 3,000 bales, amounting to $45,000, and on the second 3,000 bales, 1 3-10 less, which would foot up $19,500, or a total of $64,500 lost to the farmers in this market by not getting the average season price of 12 cents, without taking into account what they would have made by waiting for the 14 or 15 cents price: 6,336, or all but 312 bales were marketed by Dec. 31st. Sully's estimate of the coming crop is ten and three quarter million bales. If he is right, cotton will go at least as high as last season.

POPULIST COMMITTEE MEETING.

The state executive committee of the people's party met in Birmingham, August 22. A. T. Goodwin, chairman. The committee adopted as the emblem of the party a plow, saw and pick, and added nine new members to the committee, making 18 in all. The members are: 1st district G. B. Wilson, Deer Park; 2d district, E. A. Ferrin, Seabright; H. E. Brock, Brocton; 3d district, I. J. Mills, Geneva; 4th district, S. W. Collins, Thorsby; 5th district, David Majors, Maningham; 6th district, Jack Savage, Hico; 7th district, James M. Garrett, Eden; 9th district, J. B. Sloan, Oneonta. The following presidential electors were selected by the committee: State at large, M. W. Howard, Fort Payne; A. T. Goodwin, Elmore. 1st district, H. B. Wilson, Deer Park; 2d district, J. C. Fonville, Geneva; 3d district, W. J. Hicks, Ashford; 4th district, John W. Wilson, Jenifer; 5th district, E. W. Calloway, Ashland; 6th district, Dr J. S. Hollis Covin; 7th district, J. A. Hurst, Walnut Grove; 8th district, T. B. Parks, Callen; 9th district, G. B. Crowe, Birmingham.

It was decided by the committee that a grand mass meeting of the populist party would be held in Birmingham at a future date, such date to be fixed to suit the convenience of Thomas E. Watson, who will be invited to be present and speak.

The meeting was largely attended by representative members of the popplist party from all parts of the state.

Just before the close of the meeting the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we extend an invitation to all the voters in the state who believe in white supremacy and honest elections to join us in supporting the Watson and Tibbles electoral ticket.

Thorsby, Ala., Aug. 29, 1904.

Editor Union—It seems impossible for the democrats to stop mud-slinging and abuse of our candidates. I wish they'd stop for a moment and think, then they could very readily see that there isn't any real politics in such going on—If I am elected it will be on my merits and not on the demerits of my opponent, Mr. Foshee I'm proud of our people, you can't find in the columns of THE UNION, where any of them have written a single word of abuse about the democratic candidates, in fact we've entered this race to win, and to win fairly and squarely; right will always rule in the long run, and wrong rules only for a short time—I admire very much the stand that most of our defeated candidates have taken, being defeated has nothing to do with a man's principles, of course we may not like all the successful candidates, but the majority of the people do, therefore we are in honor bound to support the whole ticket. In conclusion I wish to say to the people that I am indeed thankful for the support and the nomination on July 26th, and I'll never give them cause to regret their voting for me, I'm in politics for honesty as well as office. Yours for the right,

SAM W. COLLINS.

Maplesville, Aug. 20, 1904.

Editor Union—Please allow me a little space to say that it does me good to read the letters from the defeated boys in our primary, I love to hear them say that they are in the fight just the same, it shows the man that is in them, and they have the right spirit, that they are fighting for the cause and not for the individual alone—And to those who are a little sore, just put your shoulders to the wheel and push on and the sore will soon be off—I glory in the spunk of L. B. Pounds in the way he defends himself. No, Bro. Pounds, we don't think the language too rough for the fellow that is firing from under cover, now if I were that fellow I'm sure I'd show myself and be a man, or I would forever hereafter hold my peace—But our people know that "young dem" is a coward or he would show himself. Well boys just gird on the implements of war and stand firm, you need not fear for the victory is ours. Success to THE UNION and its readers.

W. Y. NIX.

Thorsby, Ala., Aug. 29, 1904

Editor Union—I shall ask space for one more letter to reply to that slanderous lie published in the Banner last week, concerning the Thorsby wine law, as that writer calls it, and then I shall ring off, and rest my case with the good people, as I have no more time or inclination to notice all the low, dirty lies that a certain set of conscienceless reprobates are willing to stoop to, and many of my friends believe as I do, that there is an understood plan among them to keep nagging me, knowing my disposition of resentment and thus to keep the attention of the people drawn off from questions of general and greater importance. So now to answer the charges made against me concerning the so called wine law, I will say that there is not a syllable of truth in it, and if the writer of that vile charge will come to me I will treat him like a gentleman and take him to more than a dozen of the best citizens of Thorsby, and prove to him, or any other man that I never made any trade or had any other sort of understanding with any one in Thorsby, or any where else to support the measure which he speaks of, but on the other hand I can prove that I opposed the measure from first to last, and held it down until the very close of the session, then it was slipped through by a democratic trick, which I have not space here to explain, but if the writer of that letter or any one else wants to know how it was done I will take pleasure in explaining personally just how it was done and who was responsible for it, and prove all I say, that if he will not take the trouble to do this, then I brand him as a wilful and malicious liar and slanderer. Any other attack that may be made on me I shall treat with silent contempt, as they deserve.

A HAPPY LITTLE GIRL.

There was a little girl,
And she had a little curl,
Right in the middle of her forehead,
"No room for it," she said,
"On the side of my head"—
For she lived in a flat—which was horrid.

The little hat she wore,
Long behind and before,
Pointed up in the air like an arrow,
And she had a little plume
On the top. There wasn't room
On the side 'cause the flat was too narrow.

Her pretty little mouth
Always pointed north and south,
As if it only uttered "prunes" or "prism."
Neither "cabbages" or "game"
Could she undertake to name,
There wasn't even room for "rheumatism."

So the dear little girl,
With her pretty little curl,
And her plume and her "prunes" and her "prism,"
And her narrow little hat,
Dwelt contented in a flat,
For she hadn't any room for pessimism.

THE CITY MAN OUT-OF-DOORS.

Vacation Habit Means Improvement in Public Health and Happiness.

A general and killing absorption in the business of life was once the accepted theory of American activity. It is true that there is still tremendous stress shown by Americans in the pursuit not only of their business avocations but of their social avocations. Yet the business man's summer vacation is getting to be more and more an accepted institution. He manages to get longer periods of complete rest and recreation and he contrives, moreover, to seize upon any number of half holidays and over-Sunday outings, especially in the warmer months. When he can control his time he gives greater portions of it than ever before to horseback exercise and to golf and kindred sports. The business man's family, instead of being satisfied, as of old, with a few weeks in a crowded hotel by the sea or in the mountains, spend the whole summer in the country, as boarders in hotel or farmhouse, or as dwellers in a country place of their own, modest or sumptuous in accordance with their means and taste.

The city man's modern discovery of the country and his increasing use of it in the summer months has been a subject of comment now these many years. There has been discussion of its effect upon the city people themselves, and upon the country people into whose communities they enter; of its effect upon manners and morals; of its economic bearings and its relation to the abandoned farm problem, and of the greater influence upon the nation of the greater mingling of people from various parts of the country.

With all this search for recreation and health, what with Westerners going East and Easterners going West, with Northerners going South and Southerners going North, summer and winter; with all this search for the opportunity to fish and shoot, or to enjoy social pleasures; with all this interchange of national advantages (for any and every climate can be found in the United States), one may look for an improvement in the public health and happiness, as well as for a dissemination of a knowledge of our own people and of our own country which ought to be decidedly conducive to an intelligent patroitism.—From an Editorial in the Century.

The Advance of Wealth.

The advance in the standard of wealth in the last century is recognized by all as something formidable. In the writer's boyhood Thomas Cushing was the only man in Boston or its vicinity who was suspected of being a millionaire; and even in his case some regarded such wealth as incredible. He was an essentially modest, retiring man and said to a lady of my acquaintance who ventured to reproach him for having holes in his shoes that he knew no real advantage of wealth except to be able to wear one's old shoes without criticism. But what is a million dollars to-day? To the eyes of many it represents economy, almost poverty; at any rate, a step toward the almshouse. John Jacob Astor was said to be worth $20,000,000 and that was such a colossal fortune people had again to alter their standard of figures in arithmetic. After this Commodore Vanderbilt's $40,000,000 seemed but a step, and the next Vanderbilt's $200,000,000 were not so wholly startling. Yet men looked with commiseration on the division of this vast fortune by his published will. Sixty millions to each of two sons, and the rest of the family cut off with $10,000,000 apiece. Men felt like taking up contributions in the churches. Yet what seem even these wonders compared with the presonal wealth of the present day?—The Atlantic.

How Fast Do Birds Fly?

William W. Murphy, a locomotive engineer on the Burlington's fast express between Hannibal and St. Joseph, has been making observations on the speed of various birds and insects. Many birds, he says, make a practice of flying beside or in front of his engine, and when the weather is clear and there is no wind he opens the throttle and races with them.

He finds that a chicken hawk and a crow can make twenty-five miles an hour. A turkey buzzard flies at the rate of twenty-one miles an hour. The pigeon is one of the fastest birds in the United States. It makes a speed of forty-six miles an hour with ease. When chased by an eagle it can beat the Burlington's St. Louis express. The wild duck is traveling at the rate of forty-four miles an hour while the hunter is pumping the contents of a repeating gun at it. The blackbird, robin, dove and other small birds travel at a speed of thirty-eight miles an hour. The humming bird can, and does, exceed a speed of a mile per minute. Murphy says that a honey bee, the other day, flew in and out of his cab window while he was going at the rate of sixty-three miles an hour. The performance lasted while the engine traveled a half mile.—St. Joseph News.

Disraeli's Devoted Wife.

On the way down to Hatfield Mrs. Disraeli had a fall on the premises of a dealer in marble and cut her face most severely. When she reached her destination she took her hostess aside and said: "My husband is preparing a great speech. If he finds out that I have had this accident he will be quite upset. I want you to take me straight up to my room and say I've a headache. He has lost his eyeglass, and if you put me a long way from him at dinner he will never see what condition I am in." The plan answered admirably, and Disraeli did not find out what had happened for two days.—Diary of Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff.

ABOUT REGISTERING.

Extracts from the general election law of Alabama:

Section 2. The following persons shall be disqualified both from registering and voting: All idiots and insane persons; those who were by reason of conviction of crime disqualified from voting at the time of the ratification of the constitution on November 28, 1901; those who have been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted of treason, murder, arson, embezzlement, malfeasance in office, larceny, receiving stolen property, obtaining money under false pretenses, perjury, subornation of perjury, robbery, assault with intent to rob, burglary, forgery, bribery, assault and battery on wife, bigamy, living in adultery, sodomy, incest, rape, miscegenation, crime against nature, or any crime punishable by imprisonment in penitentiary, or for any infamous crimes or crime involving moral turpitude; also, any person who has been since November 28, 1901, or who shall be convicted as a vagrant or tramp, or of selling or offering to sell his vote or the vote of another, or of making or offering to make false returns in any election by the people or in any primary election to procure the nomination or election of any person to any office, or of suborning any witness or registrar to secure the registration of any person as an elector, provided that any person who is disqualified from voting by reason of conviction of any of the offenses mentioned in this section, except treason, whether the conviction was had in a state or federal court, has been pardoned, may be restored to his citizenship with right to vote by the governor, approved by the board of pardons and specially expressed in the pardon.

Sec. 7 1-2. The following persons and no others, who, if their place of residence shall remain unchanged, will have, at the date of the next general election, the qualifications as to residence prescribed by section 1 of this act, shall be qualified to register as electors, provided they shall not be disqualified under section 2 of this act:

1st. Those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who are physically unable to work; and those who can read and write any article of the constitution of the United States in the English language, and who have worked or been regularly engaged in some lawful employment, business or occupation, trade or calling for the greater part of the twelve months next preceding the time they offer to register, and those who are unable to read and write, if such inability is due solely to physical disability; or,

2d. The owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of forty acres of land situate in this state, upon which they reside; or the owner in good faith in his own right, or the husband of any woman who is the owner in good faith in her own right, of real estate situate in this state, assessed for taxation at the value of three hundred dollars or more or the owner in good faith, in his own right, or the husband of a woman who is the owner in good faith, in her own right, of personal property in this state assessed for taxation for three hundred dollars or more; provided, that the taxes due upon such real or personal property for the year next preceding the year in which he offers to register shall have been paid, unless the assessment shall have been legally contested and is undetermined.

Sec. 15. Any elector who registered prior to January 1, 1903, who has changed the county of his residence shall be registered on application or production of his certificate, unless he has since become disqualified.

Sec. 16. When the certificate of any elector who was duly registered has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, on application stating that the certificate has been lost, mutilated or destroyed, and verified by affidavit, and it appears of record that such applicant has been registered, the judge of probate of the county of registration or the secretary of state shall issue to the applicant a certificate that he was duly registered as an elector Such certificate shall be issued free of charge to the elector. The secretary of state shall at the expense of the state furnish the judge of probate blank certificates for use as provided in this section.

The certificate of the registrars or the judge of probate or of the secretary of state shall be sufficient to establish the fact of such registration.

Be sure and register when the registrars are in your beat, as the only excuse for not doing so is by reason of sickness of yourself or in your family, or by absence from the county. Everybody can register this summer who will be qualified by residence or age by the 8th day of November. Poll tax paying has nothing to do with registration; you can register now and pay your poll tax afterwards, but you can not vote unless you are both registered and have paid your poll tax (if any is due). The period of residence necessary to register is two years in the state, one year in the county, and three months in the beat. If you have moved from one beat to another in the county less than three months before election day, you can vote in your old beat, so you don't lose your vote by changing [illegible] Any one who desires to register [illegible] property qualification [illegible] with him his last assessment [illegible] and tax collector's receipt to show the registrars as proof that you [illegible] possessed of such property, and [illegible] taxes on it. You can register [illegible] ANY of the following heads:

1. If you own 40 acres [illegible] in this state, and re[illegible]

2. If your wife own[illegible] more land in this sta[illegible] you reside.

3. If you own real estate [illegible] state that is assessed [illegible] $300 or more.

4. If your wife owns [illegible] this state assessed [illegible] $300 or more.

5. If you own personal property [illegible] this state assessed for taxation [illegible] $300 or more.

6. If your wife owns personal property in this state assessed [illegible] for $300 or more.

7. If you can read and write any section of the constitution [illegible] United States.

Don't give up your [illegible] cate that you got in [illegible] only have to show it to the registrars in case you have moved in this county from some other county.

THE UNION will furnish any information on any special points [illegible] they may be in doubt upon, and stand ready to help any one to get all rights he is entitled to under the laws of Alabama. If you think you are entitled to register and the registrars should refuse you, take a couple of good men with you so you can have witnesses as to such refusal and the reasons given by the registrars, and thereby be enabled to take your case up to higher authority.

REV. H. ENGH.

The Rev. H. Engh, pastor of St. Olaf's church at Thorsby, left that town Friday for Black River Falls, Wis., where he will take charge of the church in that city as well as two in the suburbs, making a large pastorate. Mr. Engh has been in Thorsby since the winter of 1899, having charge of the congregation there and has also dipped into fruit farming, but as he very wisely remarks, a man should only attend to one to make a success. Though Mr. Engh was born in Christiana, Norway, his parents left there when he was a few months old and migrated to this country, where they settled in Wisconsin, he graduated from Luther college, Decorah, Ia., in 1878, afterwards went to Norway and took a course of theology, at the University of Christiana, this was supplemented by a year at the University of Madison, Wis. He was ordained August 19, 1883, and has had charge of churches in Oregon and Iowa, where he was very successful in his work, having a record of building four churches and a parsonage. The Thorsby church building is another token of his zeal. Mr. Engh will be a great loss to Thorsby, but we congratulate the Wisconsin people on their acquisition of a Christian scholar and gentleman. May all good fortune attend him and his family is our sincere wish.

EVERGREEN DOINGS.

Editor Union:

Last Friday saw the close of one of the most successful schools ever held in our community. Dr. B. J. Baldwin, of Montgomery, employed two lady teachers from that city, the Misses Craik and Centerfit, to teach a summer school free to all. Their motto was come and let us aid you in obtaining a higher plane in life. There was a big gathering of our people to see the closing exercises which were opened with prayer; then that grand song, "America," recitations, interspersed with music by the Headley string band. Professor Murphy, of Montgomery, made us a speech on education; also short talks by Dr. Baldwin and others. Then a nice present for every child given by Dr. Baldwin; then ice cream and cake was served to everybody. At the close of the meeting the following resolution was unanimously adopted: "Whereas, Dr. B. J. Baldwin, of Montgomery, with Mrs. Baldwin, Miss Jean Craik and Miss Valerie Centerfit, have established and conducted a most successful summer school for the young people of the 14th school district of Chilton county, therefore be it resolved by the trustees and citizens of the district in mass meeting assembled: 1. That we extend to Dr. and Mrs. Baldwin and to Miss Centerfit and to Miss Craik the most heartfelt appreciation of their labors. 2. That we recognize in the unselfish spirit which has animated this work the purpose of a true patriotism and we assure Dr. Baldwin and his associates that its fruits will long remain among us. 3. That we pledge to these honest workers our cordial co-operation in the future, and we part with them today asking the blessing of God upon them, and upon all this work in our midst; and we wish to conclude and establish these resolutions by a rising vote.

"Resolved, That these resolutions be published in our county papers."

COLLINS CHAPEL.

We had the grandest time at the chapel last Friday that could be had, and I only wish every one could have been with us, we had a crowd and plenty of dinner for three times as many. There were some grand subjects upon the program and they were well handled by the different speakers—"Co-operation" was discussed by W. A. Mims and L. B. Ponuds, then came "Organization" with I. J. Dorming and J. Bice as the speakers; then "Benefits of the Alliance," very ably handled by Hon. L. H. Reynolds and Prof. R. A. Rasco, concluding with "Honesty of Purpose," an eloquent address by L. B. Pounds. I say hurrah for the Alliance and success to THE UNION.

J. D. COLLINS.

A NICE FEE.

Sheriff Morgan collected an execution last week which was nearly six times larger than any Chilton county sheriff ever handled. It was on the Jackson Lumber Company in favor of Mrs. Lola Cunningham for the loss of her husband several years ago. Circuit court of May, 1902, gave her a verdict of $5,000. The case was appealed to the supreme court, which affirmed the verdict and the lumber company had to pay $7,033.64, the allowance and interest bringing the original sum to that figure. The sheriff has remitted this money to Mrs. Cunningham's lawyers, less his commission, which amounted to $200.49, a very neat sum for a hard working, faithful official.

It is characteristic of the St. Petersburg news-makers that, being obliged to admit the loss of two Russian battleships, they tied four Japanese ships with them. The object being to placate the St. Petersburg mobs, which have become disheartened by the constant news of Russian disasters.

"FORGET IT."

Forget about the sun spots
And you'll find the sun is bright.
Forget about the darkness
And deny there is a night.

Forget the day is rainy,
Sure, to-morrow will be fine.
Just brush aside the clouds yourself
And make your own sunshine.

A Trying Predicament.

By H. D. G. PARSONS.

In the winter of 187—, when business was very dull, I unfortunately happened to be out of a situation. I had travelled through several western cities in quest of employment, but without success. At last I found myself in one of the hotels in Louisville, studying the state of my finances and prospects.

Having received a good education, I could keep a set of books with any man; few could excel me as a salesman. My lot seemed to be doubly unfortunate. Why was I not a mechanic? I could then have easily obtained what I wanted.

In the midst of my revery, a short, stout, nervous looking gentleman, who had been eyeing me for some time, asked me if I had be[en] lo[ng] in Louisville.

Being out of sor[ts] and every one else, I did no[t] him with extreme politeness.

"You seem down-hearted," he continued, still gazing at me as if he not only wanted to know my business, but my height, size and wearing apparel; even my boots were closely scrutinized.

I evaded his question by remarking on the dull business season.

"Are you looking for work?"

"You have anticipated my wants correctly," I replied, in hopes of ending the conversation, as he did not look like a man who hired either clerks or bookkeepers.

"Are you a powerful man?" he said, continuing his examination. "If so I might hire you.

"There is not a man in the city I am afraid to grapple with," I replied eagerly, overjoyed at the sudden prospect of getting a situation.

"I think you will answer my purpose," he said, walking round me as if he were purchasing a horse.

Having finished the inspection, he took me aside and informed me in the strictest confidence, that he had a sick brother who required a nurse. From what he could see, I was competent to fill the berth.

"As to salary," he continued, "if you suit me, I will make it liberal; but one thing you must promise me."

I at once expressed my willingness to make the promise, if it would not, at any time, involve me in trouble.

He set my fears at rest at that point, as all he wanted was that while I was in his employ I would not make the world wiser as to what I was doing. There was nothing unreasonable in any employer's exacting such promise. I accepted his offer.

Bidding me follow him, we traversed several streets until we arrived in front of a large mansion in one of the principal thoroughfares. My guide using the latchkey, we entered the house without ceremony.

After dinner I was introduced to my charge, who was the exact counterpart in looks of his brother. I glanced from one to the other wondering how it was possible for two men to be so much alike.

"My name is William Harrison," said the brother who hired me, "and this is Mr. Charles Harrison."

"Twin brothers," I said, looking from one to the other.

"Yes, we are twins," said Mr. William. "Unfortunately, Charles is peculiar in his manner, and I wish you to look after him—in fact to be his constant companion."

"His constant companion," I repeated. What! Is he crazy?" I asked, aside of Mr. William.

"Yes, a little out of his head," he replied. "You must be careful not to let him get the upper hand of you in any way, and when he is violent, there is a straight jacket," he said, showing me the article on a sideboard.

"All right," I said. "Now, as I understand you, I must use this when I think proper to do so."

"Yes," he replied, "whenever you have occasion to. Of course you must use proper judgment, and not be too violent. I can see by your looks that you are a very powerful man—in fact, I pride myself on being so fortunate as to secure you."

He was right in his judgment as to my powers; I have met few men in my lifetime who equaled me in strength.

During our conversation, Mr. Charles sat still, without saying a word. I again compared them. The similarity of features, build, even their hair, which was gray, was remarkable; both were their whiskers alike. It was the first time in my life I was puzzled in making a distinction whereby I could tell one man from another.

As a last resource, I was obliged to make a note of their different costumes, in order to know Mr. Charles apart from Mr. William.

What if I was to mistake (in my routine as keeper and nurse) one brother for the other? A dread of the fearful consequence that would follow came over me, and I can assure you it was some time before I could rest easy in mind.

Mr. William retired, leaving me with my charge. The change, at least, furnished the pressing requirements for the time. Unsuited though it was to my taste, I soon fell into the dull routine the life of a nurse to a madman furnishes, and, before a week was up I felt myself perfectly able to take any first-class position that offered as keeper of the unfortunate insane community.

Mr. Charles, at times, was violent and rough in his manner, but after I had given him a taste of the straight jacket a few times, he troubled me very little. Occasionally he would go down on his knees and plead love for an imaginary lady, then start up with a blustering air, and order me out of the room as if I had no business there. And really, I must say there was very little need of my staying by him all the time; but I was paid for it so I was obliged to obey.

They were both bachelors, having considerable property. Mr. Charles became insane a few years previous. His brother preferred taking charge of him instead of sending him to an asylum.

At times, Mr. William did not appear as rational as he should be, but it was his peculiar manner. I learned from the servants that he had been for years paying his addresses to a Miss Stebbins, an elderly maiden lady belonging to one of the first families of Louisville. She often visited the house. He would be very tender in his manner toward her, and would offer her his arm when they walked in the garden, but marriage, or any arrangement to that end, was never hinted at. He seemed to be content with paying the polite addresses due from an engaged swain to the object of his choice, and there it ended. It was evident that he was either too bashful to proceed with his suit beyond that mark, or else the lady objected to him and preferred single-blessedness to the duties and cares of married life.

The latter seemed improbable, as Miss Stebbins, when they promenaded on the piazza, hung lovingly on his arm, and threw such sweet glances at her escort that they betrayed her willingness to unite her fortunes with his. Then it was clear that the fault was on the part of Mr. William.

As the summer advanced Miss Stebbins came oftener. The greenhouse required rearranging before winter set in. The alterations were begun and carried out under her plans. Mr. William was a willing slave to her ideas; and as I watched him from my window receiving her suggestions about how the dome in the centre was to be built, I really believed that had she proposed carrying it up a hundred feet high, he would have had it done.

It was evidently coming to a climax. Mr. William intended getting married; if not to Miss Stebbins, certainly some lady would soon be mistress of his establishment.

At present, no other female appeared. The only conclusion therefore to be drawn was that Mr. William Harrison and Miss Clarinda Stebbins, both of the city of Louisville, were about to commit matrimony.

As for myself, during the hot weather having little to do, I was fast growing fat and lazy, and the financial prospect before me looked decidedly cheering. So well had I managed my charge, that Mr. William hired me by the year; an agreement was made out, which we both signed, that I was to continue in the capacity of nurse to his brother for the space of twelve months, beginning June the first, at a salary of one hundred and fifty dollars a month.

Immediately after we had made this permanent arrangement, Mr. William left Louisville for a few days and I was alone with Mr. Charles.

One fine afternoon he was taking his after dinner nap, which generally lasted for a couple of hours. I foolishly left him and went out for a walk. I was gone about an hour. When I returned to the house, a sight met my eyes that made my blood run cold. Mr. Charles was in the room, not his own, kneeling at the feet of a lady.

I always prided myself on being a gallant, and would never allow a lady to be insulted, much more to see her at the mercy of a madman. I rushed in and secured him.

"How dare you come in here and behave in this manner, you rascal?" he said, in his usual crazy manner.

"I'll show you," I replied, taking the straight jacket out of my pocket, where I always carried it, ready for instant use.

"Unhand me, sir, and go out of the room," he exclaimed, pointing to the door.

By this time the lady had fainted. Seeing her drooping head, as she sank on the lounge, was enough. I grappled with him, and in spite of all he could do, I quickly put the straight jacket on him, and he was incapable of doing any further harm.

Having secured my charge, I turned my attention to the lady. Taking the water pitcher, which always stood in the room, I sprinkled her face; when she revived, and looked at Mr. Charles chafing in the straight jacket, she gave an unearthly scream, and fainted in earnest that time. I thought she was dead.

What could I do? The servants were out, and I alone with a madman in a straight jacket, and a lady in hysterics. If ever mortal was in a more trying predicament, I should like to know it.

"Let me out of this, you villain!" he thundered.

"When I get ready," I replied, taking my knife and cutting open the lady's tight dress, to ease her. I fairly drenched her in water, to no purpose. I could scarcely distinguish her breathing. Taking a lump of ice from the pitcher, and holding it to her forehead, the chill revived her a little.

I was congratulating myself on having saved her life, when she looked at Mr. Charles.

"Oh, my darling!" she sobbed out, then, giving another shriek, off she went again.

I was in a worse fix than ever, with a crazy woman as well as a man to take care of. I believe, at that moment, if I had had another straight jacket in my pocket, it would have gone on her.

I rubbed her forehead with the ice, and chafed her hands whilst my knife had perfectly loosened her dress from neck to waist.

I was afraid she would die under my hands; then what should I do? I rang the bell for the servants, but they were out, so no help came from that quarter.

Going to the sideboard, I took some brandy and held it to her lips; my charge was raving all the time.

"If you don't stop your row, and let me attend this lady, I will gag you!" I said, threatening him.

The brandy had the desired effect. She started up and rushed to him. Her dress, which before was a perfect fit, now hung in shreds. She clasped him around the neck, declaring I should not kill him.

I gently disengaged her from him.

"Come," I said soothingly, "it pains me to see you so excited. Calm yourself; I will soon get some one to take charge of you."

Seating her on the lounge, I again rang the bell for help; visible signs of hysterics appeared; she was having a relapse. I shouted for some one to come. Judge of my astonishment when she began calling me a villain for serving her darling in that way.

"My good lady," I replied, "although you are old enough to be my mother, I beg to disagree with you; it is for his good."

How far I should have gone, or what other means I should have taken to quiet my two mad people, I really cannot say, had not one of the servants entered at that moment.

"What! are you mad as well?" I said. "Come here and help me out of this plight."

She came up to us. A word was enough to reveal to my blundering eyes the mistake I had made. It was Mr. William I had been handling. To take the straight jacket off him and retire to my room was the work of a moment. I locked the door after me.

The imprecations I overheard heaped on my head were certainly enough to frighten any man of moderate nerve. Miss Stebbins' new mauve silk was all cut to pieces; even her fancy corsets were ruined by my cutting them in two, not to mention a splendid sash of watered silk, costing I don't know how much, and the shock to her nerves was irreparable.

I found my charge, the real maniac, sleeping quietly in his bed. Leaving him to finish his nap, I began to ruminate on the chances of my going to the penitentiary. Just then I overheard Mr. William ordering the servant to fetch a policeman, when Miss Stebbins interrupted him.

"Do not send for the police," she said. "We shall have to go to court, and our love be made public in the eyes of the gaping world; the Clarances will torment my life out of me."

"I will get rid of him at once," said Mr. William. "The rascal! It was only the other day I hired him for a year. Come out!" he continued, knocking at the door of my room.

My overhearing their conversation had set my mind at rest on the jail question. Miss Stebbins being in high social standing, money could not have hired her to be cross-examined in a public court, and the result of my blundering interruption of their interesting tete-a-tete made known to her friends. She was quick-sighted enough to see that, in the midst of her trouble.

When I thought their passions had cooled a little, I opened the door, and at the sight which met my eyes it was impossible for me to repress a hearty laugh, which did not raise me any higher in their opinion.

Mr. William was wiping the perspiration off his face, and declaring to Miss Stebbins that the disagreeable affair should have no effect on their engagement, while she stood by holding her dress, the splendid mauve silk, in anything but graceful folds about her lovely person.

"Villain!" said Mr. William, "get out of the house!"

"Yes, scoundrel that you are!" said Miss Stebbins, getting decidedly passionate. "I'll teach you to cut my new mauve silk and sash all to pieces! And my French corsets have not escaped; you shall be hung for it!" she shrieked.

I stood still, unable to say a word in defence.

"What are you staring at?" said Mr William.

"I am going to stay my year out," I replied doggedly. "I shan't budge until the first of next June without my salary."

"Get rid of him," said Miss Stebbins, "or I leave Louisville."

Her word was law. He went to his room and returned in a few minutes with a check, which he handed me, saying:

"There, sir, now go, and never darken my door again."

I took the check, which was for my year's salary, and went out of the house and situation in five minutes. Eighteen hundred dollars are quite an item for the loss I sustained. I came to northern Ohio, started in business, and, in spite of Mr. Harrison's maledictions and the ruined mauve silk, I am doing well from the proceeds of my "trying predicament."—Waverley Magazine.

Desert Irrigation in the Far West.

By L. R. Freeman.

BORDERING on the Colorado from the point where it emerges from its Grand Canon and begins the last stage of its seaward journey to Yuma, Arizona, where it enters Mexican territory, lie over a half a million acres of land that can be reached by diversion canals. This area will be increased to one million two hundred thousand acres when the Government's plans are carried out, and will be capable of supporting an aggregate population greater than that now living in the famous irrigated valleys of the Nile and the Po. The soil of this district is a sedimentary deposit of vast depth and amazing richness; its climate is sub-tropical, and but slightly more severe than that of Egypt and Italy, and the experiment stations have shown that, product for product, it will check with the most fertile sections of either.

The parallel between the Colorado and the Nile is most remarkable. Both rise among snow-covered mountains at great distances from their mouths and traverse semi-tropical and almost rainless deserts; both empty into great landlocked arms of the sea at nearly the same latitude—thirty-two degrees north. Each has deposited a great delta at its mouth, and has vast alluvial areas along its lower length. Both overflow in summer at a time when irrigation is most needed, and the crops of the Mojave and Yuma Indians fail when the flood is light, just as do those of the Nile farmers when similar conditions prevail there. Finally the minimum flow of each river is more than equal to the irrigating of its border lands, and the Colorado will prove, as has the Nile, the means of rendering productive and habitable its adjacent rainless regions, that otherwise would be worse than waste.

The lesser irrigation enterprises that have been launched upon the Colorado in the past have found their chief obstacle to lie in the accumulation in their canals of the sediment with which the water is so heavily charged.

This silt is mostly worn from the canon walls and carried down from the upper courses of the river. The grade of the latter is so flat through the desert that a diversion canal must have so slight a fall and so low a velocity that it cannot clear itself of the precipitated sediment. By its present plans the Government expects to utilize this extraneous matter by impounding it upon some of the vast gravelly expanses, where there is little soil at present, by means of high dams, thus securing fails for the canals, increasing the irrigable land, and eliminating much of the silt at the same time.

The plans of the Government hydrographers, as now outlined, call for a series of reservoirs along the river, to be formed by building high dams at points where the opportunities for storage appear favorable. Each dam is to be provided with a sluiceway through its base, in order that the waters may be drawn off as desired, and also to provide a means of flushing out the surplus accumulations of sediment. Canals of great size, and of a declivity sufficient to carry the silt in suspension and not evolve destructive erosion, will run from the tops of the dams.

The fall of the river is so slight that reservoirs of enormous capacity may be constructed without involving dams of impracticable height. Each reservoir will gradually fill with sediment, and when this occurs its surface will be drawn down from twenty to forty feet, thus converting all the reservoir site, except the river channel, into farming land. Then, whenever desired, the sluices may be closed and irrigation and fertilization accomplished as cheaply and with better effect than by the natural overflow upon which the Nile Valley depends.

It has been estimated, as a result of recent analyses, that water from the Colorado sufficient to cover an acre of land to the depth of three feet contains fertilizer to the value of more than ten dollars. This annual inundation, then, of a deep alluvial soil that is made up of little but fertilizers in the first place, in conjunction with the semi-tropic climate and additional irrigation as the crops may demand, will make farming possible the year round, and it is confidently expected that an acreage production will be attained without precedent in history.

The power to be developed at each dam will not be the least item of its usefulness. On account of the abundance of water, the installment of turbine plants is considered feasible, and the power generated will be in proportion to the height of the dam. This electrical energy will be used in operating river steamers—through the medium of storage batteries—running trolley lines, and pumping water to the sections of the country where the topography of the intervening country will not permit of canals. It is even proposed to operate the desert divisions of the transcontinental railroads with electricity from these river plants, and a transmission line to Jerome, Arizona, for the use of the United Verde copper mine at that point, is one of the possibilities. Both schemes are eminently practicable, and the saving of fuel to the companies interested would be immense, to say nothing of the value of an assured continuity of service.

The outside cost of this splendid system of desert irrigation is placed by the engineers at $22,000,000, while the values to be created—literally created—through its agency are beyond the possibilities of computation. Irrigated land, as such, in California and Arizona has sold as high as $1800 an acre, and under the poorest of water systems an acre is never worth less than $100. Based even on the latter figure the 1,200,000 acres to be reclaimed would we worth $120,000,000. Electrical energy to exceed 250,000 horse-power, conservatively worth $100,000,000, will be easily developed, and the improvement of navigation cannot be reckoned at less than $10,000,000. This gives a neat little total of $230,000,000 to be added to the National wealth on the completion of the system as now outlined, a sum beside which the expenditure necessary to bring it into being seems as nothing.—Review of Reviews.

That night the committee on entertainment for the coming festivities of the fair placed all power in the hands of John Black, he having demonstrated his ability to provoke mirth.

In explanation it must be said that the drops from his bottle were of some fluid which evaporates so quickly as to leave a peculiar stinging sensation, of course, which terrified the poor little beasts.

BIRD POACHERS TAKEN.

Seventy-Seven Japanese Found on a United States Island in the Pacific.

With 77 forlorn-looking Japs aboard in addition to her own crew, the United States revenue cutter Thetis came into the port of Honolulu, Hawaii, recently, with a queer story of the sea to tell. The Japanese were bird poachers whose presence on an American island was reported by Captain Niblack of the United States steamer Iroquois some weeks ago, and the Thetis was sent to stop their operations, but she arrived to find them only too anxious to leave their hunting ground and to abandon spoil which is worth at least $20,000.
